(255) "Mr. J. H. Walker: I offered a substitute, providing for six hours a day and five days a week. I am satisfied if this movement is going to continue it will come to that some time. I want it understood that I agree with Mr. Robbins that I don't want to enter into any agreement with the operators to defraud the public. There is one question that is a bone of contention, and we can trace every argument of the operators to it. I refer to the competition from the unorganized fields. I don't care whether it is the eight-hour work day, the mine-run system, the day wage scale or the tonnage rates, we find in every argument made by the operators this competition from the unorganized fields as the main factor. Now, that question has got to be met. In my opinion the amount of coal that is produced, and the method by which it is produced in the organized fields, is the one thing that we are going to have to handle in order to be able to meet competition from unorganized fields. We have two methods of meeting it. One is to agree with the operators in their contentions along these lines, taking as a basis for the present contract, prices, rates and conditions, which will allow them to compete with the coal coming from the fields where the men are unorganized. You know what that means. You know if there was a reduction in wages here now, as there was two years ago, that would not insure you from competition from those fields. Just as soon as they could do so they would rearrange their prices in order to be in the same relative position they were before. No matter how much you would increase the hours of labor in the organized fields, thereby indirectly lowering the cost of your coal, it would only be a short time until their conditions would be rearranged and they would be ready to meet you on the same old basis. There is another way. Recognize the amount of coal you have got to meet in competition and handle the output in the organized fields in such a way that the best results will follow. Then we must try the best methods for getting those fields into the organization. The miners and operators must go in partnership to the extent of entering into a mutual arrangement—you may call it a conspiracy, but I don't believe it is, and I don't believe the people of this country would consider it as much an injury for the operators and miners of the bituminous fields to get together and agree on what would be a fair living wage for every man dependent upon that industry, at the same time allow the operators a fair return on their investment, as they would if you gave us the conditions now in force in the unorganized fields. I think we should simply restrict, or by some method control, the entire output from the organized fields in such a way that you will be able to pay us a living wage, allow us to work under decent conditions and get a fair return on their investment. The only way to do that is to have control of the output and put it in such a condition that you can get the prices necessary to enable you to do this.

"I think if you were to enter into a contract for a six-hour work day, and work five days a week, and use that as a basis for your present contract, if you work together, instead of going into cut-throat competition, you will get the best results for everybody concerned. I think in this way you can get the results you are now seeking for, and they would be secured at a less cost to you and less labor for us. I think it will also bring about an organization in the unorganized fields. I am satisfied this can be done, and whether you do it now or not, later on in this movement it will have to be done in order to get what we should get out of this industry.

"Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen: The remedy Dr. Walker has prescribed for the coal trade might have some worth if all the coal that it was possible to develop was at present developed, and all the capital that could be invested in the coal industry was invested. If we were to follow his suggestion and restrict our business to the hours and days mentioned, if we were to curtail the output of our mines in that way, inviting the competition of this vast territory of undeveloped coal and the large supply of uninvested capital we would have an oversupply that would wipe us out of existence.

"Now, gentlemen, let us go back to the eight-hour day. We have suffered under the eight-hour day as much as any other State. We haven't the eight-hour day in Illinois. I am not saying that a large number of men do not live up to their contract in regard to the eight-hour day to the best of their ability; but the operators in the State of Illinois, when they want coal, cannot get eight hours' labor from their men, and especially since the shot firers' law has been in force. This morning in our own conference one of our large operators showed from carefully kept records that out of 285 men who went down in the mines in the morning, an average of only 160 were hoisted out, showing that 125 men came out during the working hours.

Give us a fair competitive wage scale and work eight hours a day and we will look after competition.

"Mr. Mitchell: I would suggest that Mr. Walker's remarks on competitive prices be eliminated from the record.

"Mr. Robbins: I object. I want those remarks to go into the record.

"Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Walker, in offering the suggestions he did, did not reflect the desires of the United Mine Workers of America. The United Mine Workers of America have no intention or desire to enter into an arrangement with the operators that will control the selling prices of the coal to the detriment of the general public, for whom we are very solicitous.

"Mr. Lewis: If there are any objections to eliminating that part of the record, I want to say, as one representative of the mine workers' organization, we won't agree at any time to enter into a partnership with the operators to raise the price of coal in this country.

"Mr. Robbins: I want to say, Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the operators, that they have never asked the miners to join with them to make any agreement to put up the price of coal, or to put any unfair conditions on the public in any manner."

p. 67, l. 12–66.
p. 68, l. 1–29.

(256) "Mr. J. H. Walker: I should like to have a correction to go in following my statement. I want to disabuse the minds of the gentlemen present of the impression they appear to have received, that I want to enter into an agreement with the operators to raise the prices of coal to the public. I did not intend to convey any such impression. The impression I did want to convey was that you should enter into an arrangement that would enable you to pay us living wages, that would permit us to live under decent conditions, and at the same time to give you a fair return on the money invested in your property."

(257) "Lately we had the mine idle because the local established a rule that the cars were to be above the tipple the night before at 8 o'clock. This is the sort of thing that is in vogue throughout the Linton District, and has been for a long time. The officials of the organization will come there and have the locals strike those things off the books. I believe the officials do the very best they can in this respect, but there is no penalty attached for doing such things, and no one suffers except the man who is running the mine. We lost three straight days in the last instance, and I don't suppose it will be two months before we will have to do it all over again. The local passes some rule, the men come out in the morning and the mine stops. After two or three days' fussing we get the mine started, but that does not help the interference with our trade."

Mr. Siefert.
p. 70, l. 15–26.

(258) "The question of the cars not being above the tipple at starting time has been up in Ohio at different times, but we did not care to bring it in here."

p. 70, l. 59–61.

(259) "Mr. Moorshead: In many locals in the State of Illinois they have an arrangement by which if there is less than a half-day's run of cars when they reach the mine they go home. In many cases where a train has just pulled by and has gone to push the empties in from the sidetrack, because the cars were not actually there on the track ready for loading, the men have gone home. Should we pay for the two hours in a case of that kind?

"Mr. Perry: Not if the men go home. If men draw the line so close as that they are not living up to the spirit of our agreement and I don't believe the officials of the State of Illinois would back them up in any such thing.

"Mr. Moorshead: I am glad to hear that.

"Mr. Ogle: I am glad to hear that said. They go a good deal farther than that in Indiana.

"Chairman Ryan: Indiana must be an awful place.

"Mr. Ogle: It is a good place. We are not only required to have the flats there in the morning, but we are required to have them there the night before. Even when they are on the part of the switch below the tipple, though they may have been there for hours, the men will not work. In case the whistle blows for work they go so far as to punish the operator by refusing to work the next day, or any other day, until there is a full day's run of cars above the tipple the preceding night. I am glad to hear Mr. Perry say what he does.

"Mr. Mitchell: Is not that a local arrangement? Is it not made by agreement with the operators?

"Mr. Ogle: No, sir.

"Mr. Mitchell: It is by agreement with the operators that the companies have not a right to blow the whistle the night before for the men to go to work in the morning unless there is a certain number of cars at the mine at 8 o'clock at night.

"Mr. Ogle: Several years ago at one mine such an arrangement was made, and the miners have systematically tried to force it on every other mine in the State. They have had a great deal of success. This solicitude for the day men is really quite unnecessary. In our district when the machine man comes to work and wants to work, or if it is absolutely necessary for him to cut his coal so the men may work next day, he is forbidden to do so."

p. 77, l. 30–62.

(260) "Mr. Taylor: Before the Illinois coal operators will vote on an advance in the present price, or on any other price for the coming year, they desire to have incorporated in any agreement that could be made or is made by this convention the following:

" 'That the mining rate shall include the mining, shooting and loading of the coal, and timbering of the working; place; and, that where shot firers are employed, the miners shall reimburse the operator for the entire expense occasioned thereby. That in machine mines it shall include the proper snubbing of the coal.

" 'That this scale is based upon existing mining laws, and in case new laws are enacted, increasing or decreasing the operating cost of producing coal, the contract scale rates affected thereby shall be increased or decreased to compensate therefor.

" 'That the scale shall embody specific provisions for suspending the check-off in case of suspension of work in violation of contracts, and providing for adequate compensation to the operator for loss occasioned thereby, the same to be paid by the miners' local offending and to be insured by the retention of a suitable portion of the union dues collected."

p. 82, l. 32–49.

(261) "Mr. Taylor: In making this demand the Illinois operators do so from the fact that when we made our contract two years ago we thought we knew what our coal was going to cost us. We had a clause in our contract which provided that no demand should be made locally which should increase the cost of our coal. After our miners had made an effort in our convention to have a shot-firers' clause inserted in our contract, and having failed to do so, they appointed a legislative committee to lobby a shot-firers' bill through the Illinois legislature. That committee went before our legislative body, affiliated themselves, as I understand, with a lobby appointed by the Federation of Illinois, and by trading votes in cities for votes in mining districts they carried such weight in the legislature that they carried the law through. It was against all fairness and against the contract they had with us, and imposed upon us a condition which absolutely changed the provisions of our contract. In fact, it changed our contract to such an extent that it was entirely abrogated. We had meetings with the legislature and with different committees of the legislature; we had meetings with committees of our miners; we argued, pleaded and threatened, and finally the law was enacted and we were forced to suspend work in the State. We had no contract to work under, the action of our men having abrogated it. Then the men began to see light, and we got together and eliminated by agreement part of the iniquities they had imposed upon us. The matter of shot firers was left to arbitration. Two miners and two operators were selected, and they selected Judge Gray. He decided that the miners, having contracted to mine, load and shoot coal and take care of the working places were bound to do it. He further ruled that the inspection of the shots was not part of the contract, and therefore the operators must bear that additional expense under the police laws of the State. He took the stand that he found that law on the statute books of Illinois. The miners have not denied that they had that law passed. They were proud of it then, but I don't think they are now. Judge Gray's decision will carry until the first of April, but it expires with the present contract. He simply ruled under the contract.

"Now, the operators of Illinois do not intend to agree upon anything in this Interstate Agreement that will send us back to our own State with a condition confronting us which will absolutely change every condition of mining in our State and throw us out of line anywhere from 5 to 10 cents a ton with the other States."

p. 82, l. 52–67.

(262) "We will not agree to a settlement on the basis of the prices we now receive for our labor. We expect to receive an advance in wages, and we will not vote in this committee for a settlement except on a basis of an advance in wages. We did not require from 9 o'clock this morning to 4 o'clock this afternoon to make up our minds. Our minds and our policy is irrevocably made up. There will be no settlement by agreement except upon a basis of an advance in wages."

Mr. Mitchell.

(263) "Mr. Mitchell: I want to approach this subject with an entire realization of what it means to me personally; because after all, every man in this world feels personally how things will affect him. I believe there is not one man in this meeting, either miner or operator, whom a disagreement will affect more personally than it will affect me. I trust you will pardon me for discussing this from a personal standpoint, but I think I have done as much to build up a relationship between the miners and the operators that has been mutually advantageous as any man in America. But I want to emphasize this one point: If this is the end, if this is Utopia for the coal miners, then this movement means nothing for us. Is there no hope for us? Is the present wage scale the best we can have? Is there no condition of industry that means more for the miners than they now have? I am not willing to agree that the coal miners of this country shall have no more wages, no more favorable conditions of employment than now prevail under our present contract.

"What is the condition of industry? Our entire country is prosperous. The iron trade, railroads, stocks, commerce, everything is at its maximum—and what have we got? A proposition to live under a reduction of wages while every other class of industry is getting an advance in wages. The iron men have been advanced 25 cents a day. Stocks have advanced 100 per cent. I say, gentlemen, it is not fair and it is not equitable to ask us to do it. And, so far as I may by my influence determine the policy of the miners' convention, there will not be a renewal of the present agreement.

"Mr. Robbins: I do not believe that Mr. Mitchell personally or that the United Mine Workers of America can afford to take an arbitrary position in this matter. Through this movement their wages have been increased practically 100 per cent. What under Heaven does Mr. Mitchell mean when he asks if this is all there is in the movement? If you will hold what you have got you will be mighty lucky. What other industry can show such an increase in wages? Your conditions have been improved just as much as your price has been improved. And yet you come in here, when you can show no argument to show that the selling price of coal has been advanced, and ask for an increase in your wages. The selling prices of coal are away below the prices of two years ago. This decline in prices has been borne by the operators. The fields that are in this interstate movement have reached their maximum of tonnage as compared with last year, while the fields that are unorganized are constantly increasing their output. Your day labor is higher today than in any other field. The day labor in the anthracite field is anywhere from 40 to 60 cents a day less, and yet you belittle the movement. As I said in the operators' meeting today, the operators had stood for the movement for humanity's sake, rather than for any personal or financial advantage. Has this been wasted? Has what we have been doing been thrown away? Is it not appreciated by the other side? If it is not, it is time to terminate the movement. And I know of no better position on which the operators can stand before the public, with a depression in their business, with the small, very small, return of profit on their investments, when they offer to continue a rate of wages that is within 5 cents a ton of the highest that has ever been reached. I know of no better position we can take to go before the country than that, and I want, if this movement is broken up, to have it broken up by the miners, on such an unfair proposition as that made by Mr. Mitchell."

p. 93, l. 10–58.

(264) "You miners in Illinois agreed to do a certain amount of work for a certain amount of money and, as I understand it, it has not been denied that you have, after making this agreement, gone to your representatives in the legislature and got them to place a law on the statute books which practically abrogated your agreement and compelled the operators to pay more than you agreed with them to pay."

Mr. Jones.
p. 96, l. 57–63.

(265) "Mr. Chapman: In the remarks I shall make I do not intend to undertake to interfere in any way with the right of any legislature in this country to pass all the police regulations and laws necessary to protect the lives of the miners or the property of the operators. It seems to me, however, that in States where laws are passed that require the operators to pay for something that is provided in the contract the miners shall do, in all future contracts that provision should be eliminated and prices that may be paid the miner for shooting and blowing down the coal should be eliminated entirely from the scale and not become a part of it, if by law the operators are required to perform that duty."

(266) "When it comes to a question of competition between Ohio and other fields, we can show by actual figures that the increase in the State of Ohio for the past three years has not kept pace with the increase in other States; in fact, the production has not increased at all. From 1903 to 1904 it increased 10,000 tons, according to the report of the mine inspector. 1905 is not yet tabulated but my information is that the production for the year 1905 will be about a stand-off with the two previous years. Some sections of the State have lost tonnage; other sections have increased some. What has our sister State of West Virginia done in that period? She has gone up at the rate of five to six million tons a year. She is continuing to increase her production and it is only a question of the ability of the operators in that State to get transportation that determines the amount of coal they can get into the market. Two new railroads are now going into that State, one from the seaboard and the other from the North, connecting with all the distributing points in the Northwest. Those roads will scatter that coal, and what State, judging by the figures that are made up in the various Bureaus of Labor statistics, will be most seriously affected? Our State of Ohio is the one; it will be affected in its every field. This coal can be found at almost every station upon every line of railroad that traverses the State of Ohio. It can be found in Indiana, in Chicago, and everywhere. It can be found in Michigan, in Cleveland, and we cannot meet the competition with our present prices. They can and do undersell us, and when I say to you that mine-run coal is produced in the Pocahontas field and put upon the cars at less than 40 cents per ton, including royalties, you will see what chance we have to compete with them. That is probably the best soft coal that goes into the market anywhere. Other mine run coals in West Virginia are put on the cars at 60 cents and 80 cents for lump coal, including royalties and everything, and I ask the miners of Ohio what in the name of conscience we are to do to give you work if the price of our coal is advanced? These are no idle statements, my friends. They go down to the bottom. If the operators are to continue in this line and give you work, how are we to do it if you put such an obligation upon us? If we try to do it we will be required to pay you out of the small savings of the past. We cannot do that; we simply close our properties down and hope for better things in the future. We are willing to continue in this movement, but we are not willing to take our past savings to keep up the pay rolls in Ohio. We are willing, as the limit we feel it possible for us to go, to continue a scale for 1906 upon the very terms and conditions of the past two years, without a single cent added to our cost of production and we will do the best we can to give you work and go along together."

Mr. Chapman.
p. 100, l. 1–35.

(267) "The operators have not asked the miners to concede any right or to restrict themselves in any privilege before the respective legislative bodies. They can ask for any legislation they desire. Nor do we wish to curtail their rights to do so. We have not asked nor suggested, either directly or indirectly, a reduction in wages as a basis of settlement. The only contention we make is this: You have no right to come here and contract to shoot the coal for a cent a ton, or 2 cents a ton, or 3 cents, and then go and secure an act of the legislature to relieve you of the shooting, but continue to draw money for doing it. You have a right, if you want to, to ask the legislature, after you have made a contract for so much per ton for loading coal, to be relieved of that, but if the operators load it they should be paid for it. We don't attempt to restrict your rights, but we do say if you attempt to do that you ought not to draw the money for it. If it is worth 52 cents in Grape Creek for mine-run coal on the car, which carries with it the digging, loading, securing of the place and the shooting of the coal, then it is worth less than 52 cents a ton when the shooting is eliminated. It would be worth less if the timbering was eliminated, and still less if the loading was eliminated.

"We do not say you have not the right as American citizens to go to the legislature to seek for legislation you believe is for the common good; but we contend when you do that and disturb the competitive relationship established in this convention you have a right to come here and to correct it."

p. 103, l. 4–25.

(268) "The only thing we ask is, when you contract with the operators to do a given piece of work for a stated price, that you will do that work as long as you can, and if at any time the state prohibits you from doing it, that you will refuse to draw the pay. That is honorable."

p. 103, l. 39–42.

(269) "There is no use attempting to draw parallels or to get out of this one fact, you are not doing the work you contracted to do and you are demanding the pay. It does not matter how you construe it, when you come down to the last analysis, that is the fact. You have no more right to draw the proportionate amount of the 52 cents that applies to the shooting of coal, unless you do the shooting, than you have to draw the entire 52 cents if the coal company should do the entire work. I am not saying it is 1 cent, I am not saying it is 5 cents; I don't know to what extent that law in Illinois disturbs the relative basis, but I do know that to whatever extent it does disturb them this institution ought to be big enough to correct it and do Illinois justice."

Mr. Penna.
p. 104, l. 1, 2.

(270) "If there was ever an unlawful combination in this country it was formed in your convention yesterday. Talk about trusts! What trust can compare to the resolution adopted in your convention yesterday? It is simply a threat, a menace to the business interests of this whole country! You have threatened that you will compel an advance by reason of a combination of all the miners of this country, and British Columbia, anthracite and bituminous miners, and compel the people at large to suffer from that combination."

p. 114, l. 48–54.

(271) "I want to protest further against your methods here yesterday. When this interstate movement was formed the operators and miners of four states met together and in joint conference discussed and settled their difficulties. I object to your change. It is unfair and unbusinesslike, to bring in all the miners of this country and British Columbia, anthracite and bituminous, and ask them to vote upon the propositions of the operators of the States of Indiana, Illinois, Ohio and Pennsylvania. It is a thoroughly unbusinesslike proposition, and it is one we will not submit to. We propose to deal with our miners evenhanded, the same representation on each side. We don't propose to submit our questions to be settled by miners of other States that are competitive and that have absolutely different conditions and different purposes."

Mr. Robbins.
p. 115, l. 4–14.

(272) "You have tied your hands by your resolution which provides that there shall be a settlement in all the districts or in none. One little bit of a dinky mining interest up in Michigan can interfere with the mining interest of the whole country."

Mr. Robbins.
p. 115, l. 20–23.

(273) "So far as our unlawful association is concerned, my reply to that statement is this: We control our own labor and we have a right to sell that labor collectively at the highest price the conditions of this country will warrant us in demanding."

Mr. Lewis.

(275) "INTERSTATE CONVENTION 1906.
(Second Conference)

"Coal Miners and Operators.
Western Pennsylvania, Ohio,
Indiana and Illinois.

Held in Indianapolis, Ind.
March 20th to 29th, 1906.

EXPLANATORY.

"The second joint conference was held pursuant to the suggestion of President Roosevelt, in the following letter addressed to Mr. Francis L. Robbins, of the Pittsburg Coal Company, a similar letter having been addressed to Mr. John Mitchell, President of the United Mine Workers of America:

"'The White House, Washington, February 24, 1906.

"'Sir:—

"'I note with very great concern the failure in your late convention on joint interstate agreement, to come to a basis of settlement of the bituminous mining scale of wages. You, in your business, have enjoyed great industrial peace for many years, thanks to the joint trade agreement that has resulted from the action of your successive conventions.

A strike such as is threatened on April 1st, is a menace to the peace, the business interests and the general welfare of the country. I urge you to make a further effort to avert such a calamity. You and Mr. Mitchell are joint chairmen of the trade agreement committee of the National Civic Federation. It seems to me that this imposes an additional duty upon you both, and gives an additional reason why each of you should join in making this further effort.

Very respectfully yours,

Theodore Roosevelt.'"

p. 141, l. 1–29.

(276) "The shot firers' bill in Illinois was not passed jointly, as Mr. Mitchell quotes in the other States; it was passed at a time when our miners were under contract to do certain work. It was passed by the strongest labor lobby ever sent to the State capital, a combination of the State Federation of Labor, the United Mine Workers and other labor organizations. The miners have not denied this. It was an outrageous thing to do. As much as we have suffered under that bill it is not to be compared to what we would suffer if it was in full force. The bill, if in full force, would practically shut the mines of Illinois. It would absolutely destroy the competitive relations between Illinois and other States, and it would destroy competitive relations between mines in our own State."

Mr. H. N. Taylor.
p. 148, l. 1–10.

(277) "Mr. Bent: The point you make overlooks the point that our scale is not made on the earning power of the men. It is a competitive scale."

p. 152, l. 26, 27.

(278) "Some operators in that State did not care to enter the movement, and we made rates that placed them at a disadvantage."

Mr. J. H. Walker.
p. 165, l. 44, 45.

Note.—Walker referred to Illinois.

(279) "The insterstate scale of wages, which was first framed in 1898 included a provision for the price to be paid for pick mining, so called in the contract, at Danville, Illinois. It included prices to be paid for the same general class of work in Indiana, in the Hocking Valley of Ohio, and in the Pittsburg vein of Western Pennsylvania. Those wages were conceded at the end of long argument, combined with the arbitrament of force in the field. Those relative scale of wages were fixed, and they were not only supposed and believed, but they were intended to place these various districts on a relatively equitable competitive basis. That was always understood. It was understood at the beginning of the formation of this scale, and it has been understood ever since, in theory, as the foundation for this movement."

p. 166, l. 55–66.

(280) "As I understand it, this Ryan Resolution is so worded that if the anthracite people do not agree, or if the Southwestern people are unable to come to an agreement, or, in fact, if any class in connection with this interstate movement cannot come to an agreement, none of us can go to work."

Mr. Moorshead.
p. 179, l. 5–9.

(281) "Mr. Winder: We understand that when the original call was made for a joint conference some eight years ago, it included only the operators and miners of these four States. It was the understanding of the operators at that time, and it is their understanding of the matter now, that no persons not engaged in the business in the four States have any right to participate in any way in the settlement of our scales. We feel that it is difficult enough, large as this meeting is, to reach an agreement, without being subjected to the interference of either operators or miners outside of the four competitive States. We seriously object to any propositions which we make being considered by other miners than those employed by the representatives of the operators here. The larger the scope given to this movement the more difficult it is going to be each year to reach a settlement. If you want to find an easy way of destroying the movement, I know of no better way than to permit any interference whatever from any operator or miner outside the Central Competitive Field."

p. 182, l. 37–50.

(282) "Mr. Winder: In a movement as great as this there must be periods when it is impossible for one district to be able to pay more for mining on account of local conditions that exist, than it is possible to be paid by other districts a part of the joint movement. We are confronted today with this kind of a proposition. The Pittsburg District announces the fact that they are willing to effect a settlement on the basis of a 5.55 per cent advance. It is to be presumed that if they are willing to make a settlement on that basis they are able and can afford to do so. Upon the other hand, the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, with equal sincerity, have attempted to show to you the absolute inability on their part, on account of the conditions existing in their fields, to grant such an advance. I do not believe it can be argued with any justice that, because the Pittsburg District is in a position to pay this advance, the other States must be made to suffer on that account. There are only two ways, it seems to me, this matter can be adjusted with fairness. We all recognize the principle that there are times in a great movement when some sacrifices have to be made in order to continue together. It is therefore only possible to reach an agreement under those circumstances, by a sacrifice being made by the minority in this movement, or else that a differential be agreed to that will enable that part of the field that is unable to pay the advanced scale to work.

"We have no desire in the world to prevent the miners in the Pittsburg District from obtaining an advance, and we regret exceedingly that we are not in a position to offer to our people a similar advance. I trust that this body will consider the propriety of permitting that part of the field that is unable to pay this advance to sign up a scale based upon a proper differential. I can find no other solution for our difficulties at this time, and nobody will regret more than I do the necessity for the suspension or a rupture of our joint relations, which have been of so much value to us in the past."

p. 183, l. 14–41.

(283) "Mr. T. L. Lewis: This discussion this morning is bringing out something of interest. It is of interest to both the operators and miners of this competitive field. It has brought out the fact that there are operators in this convention representing very large interests in the unorganized fields, and these unorganized fields have been mentioned as being a keen competitor of men who are represented in the interstate movement. It seems to me now that one obstacle in the way of arriving at an agreement can be removed by the gentlemen who are interested in the Irwin District agreeing that they will use their influence to bring the properties they represent into this joint movement and pay scale rates at their mines. There can be no argument against it, because it is not the Pittsburg District alone, but there are other interests represented here on the one hand to make contracts with us, and they refer to the fact that we are not able to organize the men in these fields.

"The other day Mr. Cantwell asked Mr. Penna why he had not organized them when he was president of the United Mine Workers. Mr. Penna very properly answered because he was not able to organize them. We might add to that the reason the United Mine Workers have not organized them up to this time is because we cannot. Our failure is due to the opposition of the operators in the Irwin District, and some of those operators are represented in this convention. Now, if we want to be placed on a proper basis, let us all join hands and make those mines union mines, and I think the United Mine Workers can go into the Irwin field and lick the other fellows in very short order."

p. 200, l. 4–26.

(284) "We don't want an industrial fight, but we are not going to pay an increase in wages over those now prevailing until you have shown additional reason why an advance should be paid. The only reason you have shown is simply that you want an advance because you want it, and you are going to have it or paralyze industry in America. You say you want an advance because you believe you are strong enough to get an advance, and the operators have a choice between that and an industrial calamity. If there has been any other reason assigned in any of these meetings, we have not heard it. There have been other excuses, but not any other reason why the advance should be paid. There never was a time in the history of coal production in this country, and there is no likely to be for a long time, when a request for an increased wage could be made with less propriety than at this particular time."

p. 214, l. 43–55.

(285) "I don't know what can be done or how a strike can be avoided, unless perhaps when we cannot agree the people may interfere. It may be that we shall ask them to interfere. The anthracite strike was settled by a commission appointed by a representative of the American people, the President of the United States. I know of no reason why we cannot avert a calamity by the same means, either at this time or in the future. One thing is sure, the American people will not suffer any very great inconvenience because of a disagreement amounting to a paltry $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in wages. The difference is too small, it is too trifling to warrant a strike of such magnitude as that contemplated by you and feared more or less by ourselves."

Mr. Penna.

(286) "It is my desire at this time in talking to you to state as plainly and in as few words as possible the contention and the things that led up to the contention between the operators of the State of Illinois and the United Mine Workers of America.

"The trade agreement which has been in existence between the operators and miners since 1898 has been at its inception considered the means of settling all future difficulties, and we believed that wisdom and common sense had finally found a way to outweigh force and strife. Being a voluntary contract, as this agreement is, it is worth only the endorsement on its back, namely, the integrity of the parties who are the makers of the contract. When we signed the scale two years ago and had worked under it for several months the miners of the State of Illinois, through a legislative committee, sent a lobby to the State Capitol at Springfield. That lobby became affiliated with the lobby of the Illinois State Federation of Labor, and they were able to pass any bill they put before that legislature, right or wrong. It is not a nice thing to say that our law makers can be influenced by a body possessing a great many voters, but it is so. That bill disrupted the competitive relations between the States of Ohio, Pennsylvania and Indiana and the State of Illinois, in as much as it destroyed the differential at the basing point of Danville. It also disrupted the competitive relations between the different districts in the State of Illinois, and even disrupted competitive relations between mines in the same district. It created chaos. It took away from the miner part of the work he had contracted to do, and put the expense upon the operators, while the miners still continue to receive their pay for the work they did not perform."

(287) "If you gentlemen upon that side of the house will provide means by which you can stop the competition from West Virginia, from Kentucky and from Tennessee coming into the City of Indianapolis and into Ohio cities and taking the trade of the Indiana and Ohio miners, then there would be some consistency in this thing. But there is no remedy proposed. This competition is going on, and it will continue to go on. And if the operators have to pay higher prices for the production of their coal in these states it means the closing, the shutting up, the destroying of the value of many of the properties."

(288) "Mr. Moorshead: We are denied by law the artificial prices—if you are pleased to call them that—that could be gained by combining our business affairs as you gentlemen do yours. You can combine with impunity—I suppose you have a great number of votes—but if we combine we see the penitentiary pretty well staring us in the face for defying the law. I am very sorry you do not take that seriously, but I want to assure you that it is a very serious matter to the gentlemen on this side. There might be means by which we could control the coal industry if we had money enough to do it in the right way, by buying it all up, but we are unable to accomplish that. It is only a very short time ago, within the memory of our national President, that a number of coal operators in Northern Illinois, wno saw fit to send out a schedule of price of coal which had been agreed upon in a meeting among them, were taken into court and fined $500 each for doing it. Is not that right, Mr. Mitchell?

"Mr. Mitchell: They didn't go to the penitentiary, did they?

"Mr. Moorshead: No; they did not go to the penitentiary, but it is a penitentiary offense if the court sees fit to exercise its authority properly. But whether it is or not, we are not going to be law-breakers in that sense; we are going to conduct our business in a reasonably honorable way."

p. 228, l. 43–61.

(289) "The gentlemen from Illinois have suffered so long from the powers of the pit committee, from the dictation of the locals and from conditions that have been placed upon them in one way and another, that it matters not to them whether they operate their properties or not."

(290) "It is a common thing in the State of Illinois to have our operations suspended, sometimes because the president of the local takes the stand to quit at 12 o'clock because they have had trouble among themselves; sometimes because the cars for the mines are on the main track and going by the mine ready to be put on the tracks; but a local has passed a resolution that half of the tonnage in cars must be on the track at starting time or they won't go to work. They say they are not on the side-track and they will not work. How would you like a dose of that kind if you were the owner of a coal mine? And yet those are common indulgences on the part of the miners in Illinois."

Mr. Moorshead.
p. 231, l. 1–8.

(291) "Gentlemen, I am not and never have been an apologist for conditions in the Pittsburg District. I have fought and antagonized—I believe justly—the policy of the Pittsburg Coal Company, and went so far some years ago as to threaten to fill that district with organizers and close their mines after we had signed a scale in this city."

p. 257, l. 56–60.

Excerpts from book entitled "JOINT CONVENTION OF THE IILLNOIS COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION and the UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA.....DISTRICT 12 HELD AT SPRINGFIELD, ILL., May 17 to June 1, 1906.

This book is otherwise known in the record of the case of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company against John Mitchell and others as McKinley's Exhibit No. 2. [Record pp. 706, 291.]

(292) "No doubt some of you think I am leading up to the proposition of asking you to agree with us that no one in the State of Illinois who is not a member of the Illinois Coal Operators' Association shall be given a scale. I am not going to do that because I don't believe it would be either legal or right. But we do ask you, in all fairness, to impose upon these scabs that you are doing business with an additional cost on their wage scale, which is equivalent to putting us on a basis to do business with you."

(293) "Now, gentlemen, are you going to put us on a competitive basis with the scabs that are now producing coal in Illinois? That is the first thing we want to know. When that is settled we will know where we are at in the building of a scale. We don't want anything impossible from you, nor do we want anything from you that can be construed by the finest legal mind to be illegal, but we do want justice from you. If you look on us as being friends, or if you look on us as being of any benefit to your organization, we ask you to accord us fair treatment and put us on a level with the people that are now making a little temporary gain on account of our failure to reach an agreement with you. When the time comes those people will throw you up in the air as far as they tried to throw us. Those gentlemen who are working their mines now and shirking their part of the expense of these trade agreements are welcome to the money they are making. I want no relations with them, but I want an assurance from you people that you are going to treat us right in this matter."

p. 13, c. 2, l. 1–18.

(294) "Mr. Mitchell: This discussion is very much foreign to what I expected when I came here. I don't know whether my conception of right and wrong is as keenly developed as that of the other gentlemen present; but certainly my mind is not in accord with what has been said concerning the policy of this organization. The policy of making separate settlements was favored by me; I believed it then and I believe it now to be a wise policy. We gave no advantages to those men of whom you speak that we did not offer to you. We offered to give you a contract carrying with it the same advance in wages as was given to them. If we were giving them a contract more advantageous than the one we are offering to you, then you would have just cause for complaint. As for giving assurance of what we will do in the future, that cannot be done. Some of you gentlemen here, and Mr. Bush in particular, will remember that in the Southwest we did compel operators to join your association, and you in turn compelled miners to come into our organization. In one case there was an entire sub-district where the miners were receiving 5 cents above the scale made for them, and we were compelled to force some thousands of our members to accept a reduction because you would not permit the operators in your association if they paid a higher scale than was made for them."

p. 13, c. 2, l. 19–57.

(295) "Mr. Newsam: I am one who believes in trade agreements. I have always believed in them. I joined this association in 1898, and I have been on the executive board and the scale committee ever since. I have always believed that these associations joined together would do good if carried on on right lines. I am sorry to say that the miners in the last convention in Indianapolis departed from a principle they had always upheld before. Since 1898 this scale has always been made and signed by the two organizations, not by outside parties who never paid a cent to the joint movement. I know of no organization that has ever done what has been done since we left Indianapolis. I believe that what was done was entirely wrong to both miners and operators. I have been helping to keep up the association, paying my dues to it, going to meetings and trying to make scales, while these other gentlemen have been staying at home and reaping the benefit of my money and my labor. Before this we have always let the majority rule. I believe the majority should rule. I don't believe the minority should rule, especially when the minority runs down to one man. I don't like the Czar, I don't like Witte; and I believe we ought to get together and stop this Czar and this Witte. He may have more money than I have, but I don't think he is a better man. He is a traitor to the cause of unionism from the top of his head to the soles of his feet. And I am not speaking of him alone; there are others in the State of Illinois. They are coming to your organization and offering to sign up, and the people who have been keeping your organization up, the people who have been spending their money and doing the work that benefits both sides, are the ones who have their mines tied up, while these scabs, these miserable scabs, are allowed to go to work and gain an advantage over those who have been the mainstay of your organization. I think this thing ought to be ironed out; I think it ought to be explained. I think what has been done is wrong."

p. 14, c. 2, l. 1–16.

(296) "For myself personally I want to say this: I would rather do business with an association of employers than with individual employers, and as far as I am concerned I am willing to contract with you that no union miner will work for an operator who is not a member of your association if you will hire no one who is not a member of our organization. I am only speaking for myself, now, remember."

(297) "I want the operators that made individual settlements with your people to pay 3 cents a ton more than we do, or 2 cents a ton, or whatever the cost of maintaining this organization is, and 3 cents does not pay for the cost of maintaining this association in the cash donations and the time the members give to it. I will put it on another basis. Make them pay what it costs you to maintain your organization. We don't ask you to give us this money; keep it yourselves if you want it. The competition in this business in Illinois is down to so fine a point that 1 cent a ton will mean our ability to give you work."

p. 15, c. 2, l. 29–46.

(298) "Mr. Perry: I said I would agree, so far as I am personally concerned—and I think the miners will agree with me—that we will refuse to work for any operator in the State of Illinois who is not a member of the Operators Association, if you on your part will agree that none but union men will be hired by members of the Illinois Operators Association.

"Mr. Bush: I will agree to that."

p. 16, c. 1, l. 1.

(299) "I know we cannot get a legal agreement out of you to not work for operators who are not members of the association, and I know you can get no legal agreement from us binding us not to hire men who are not members of your organization. The open shop, although it has not been an open shop, has been a recognized part of our contracts. I trust in the new contract I hope will be drawn it will not only be a recognized fact, but a fact carried out."

Mr. Peabody.
p. 16, c. 2, l. 1–8.

(300) "Now a word as to the production in Illinois as compared with other states. You should take into account, gentlemen, that Illinois is located the best of any State, practically, in the United States to market its coal. It is right on the threshold of the great Northwest with its unlimited market, and the population there is increasing right along. The manufactories in Illinois are increasing rapidly. It is the center of distribution, and the natural one, for the different manufactured products, and that part of our industrial system is increasing very rapidly. The railroad interests in Illinois have grown and they are doing a tremendous business. The fact of the increase I have spoken of in manufacturing and railroad business is the only reason why we have been able to maintain anywhere near the percentage of increase we should."

p. 47, c. 2, l. 30–52.

(301) "West Virginia is in the wilderness, with no local markets whatever, and the only reason on earth why they can sell their coal at all is on account of their low mining rates. It is a non-union state and is not hampered by the union restrictions as Illinois is. Of course they have a good grade of coal. The mining rate is not all of it. The restrictions thrown around the operations of the mines in Illinois mean a great deal more than a higher mining rate in many instances. After we went into the union we increased the wages of our day men in many instances substantially 50 per cent, but we found our cost had increased 300 per cent. That shows to some extent what the union did for Illinois."

Mr. Lukins.
p. 48, c. 1, l. 1–9.

(302) "Ohio is centrally located between the eastern markets and the western markets. For most of the coal they have to go out of the State to get a market. It can take care of its own home markets, but they do not keep up with its production, and its only other legitimate market is to the west, because east of it is the monster coal fields of West Virginia and Pennsylvania."

Mr. Perry.
p. 55, c. 2, l. 8–18.

(303) "All coal is going west after you leave the Pittsburg District, and one coal shoves the other along."

p. 56, c. 2, l. 48–51.

(304) "Mr. Hammond: If it is admitted that the non-union mines increased their output 12,000,000 tons that must have been at the sacrifice of the union mines.

"Mr. Mitchell: That would be true if all this non-union coal went into the markets that were formerly supplied by union coal. I don't know where it went.

"Mr. Hammond: A large proportion of it went into the markets formerly supplied by union coal. Another thing struck me as an odd situation, to say the least, and that is the position we are in, practically as a result of dealing absolutely with union miners, as compared with Kentucky where part of the mines are operated by non-union labor and part by union labor. That is a situation that must be remedied in some way, either by the miners or by the operators, or by both in conjunction. That brings about an unfair competition and there should be some means of correcting it. My idea is that both miners and operators should do everything within their power to correct those matters and to get all the States on a fair competitive basis. I believe that both sides should make reasonable concessions in that direction. There are many of us who know we are out of line so far as competition is concerned with much of our coal with other States, and the indications are that Kentucky can continue, even after we have made an agreement here, to continue to send an ever-increasing amount of tonnage into a territory that rightfully belongs to Illinois. We certainly have a right, as a matter of fairness, to have Kentucky unionized and controlled the same as we are, or that we have a reasonable number of non-union mines in the State of Illinois as a menace against your organization to help us get some of the benefits they enjoy. I simply submit that as a reasonable proposition."

p. 59, c. 2, l. 5–55.

(305) "The fact that 12,000,000 tons more of non-union coal was produced last year than the year before—if it is true—is something that interests us as well as it does you. There is no question about that. I am thoroughly satisfied that if every operator in the joint movement had spent the same amount of money in proportion to his earnings in the coal industry, and the operators as a whole had spent the same amount of time and energy the United Mine Workers have since this movement started, it would have been an utter impossibility for that 12,000,000 in excess of the previous year's tonnage to have been produced. I don't care how we may deal with the details of the situation as we find it in Illinois, we are going to have that question to take up finally and we must solve it if this movement is to last. There is no way of getting around this. When a man we know is a member of our organization, goes into those fields to mine coal he is put out of the organization. I don't believe you can say that much for the members of your organization. I don't know that you have spent a dollar to get these fields in line. And not only that, you have men in your association who are not only not doing anything to help the situation there, but are using what power they have to make it as much worse for us as possible. You retain such men in your association, to say nothing of failing to spend time and money to help control the situation. You even refuse as an association to meet with us and help us get what we know would be a competitive agreement for all those fields, every one of them, non-union and union included, so we would know just what basis those men should be working on. You even refused to lend us your assitance to that extent, let alone coming together with us to make such a contract and have it enforced."

p. 60, c. 2, l. 1–30.

(306) "I believe we ought to have a conference of the coal miners and the operators of the entire country and make a scale for every mother's son of them."

p. 61, c. 2, l. 38–41.

(307) "Of course we cannot enter into an agreement to restrict the output, because that is illegal."

p. 65, c. 1, l. 45–47.

(308) "Now if you cannot go to the miners in West Virginia and the other non-union fields and convince them that affiliation with your organization will better their condition, not only in the hours of work but in the amount of work they render to the coal operators, when you show them it is without doubt a financial inducement to them to join with you, how in the world can you expect the operators if they have any allied interests in those fields, to go to their friends or anyone else and try to induce them to place themselves in the same position we are in? What inducement is there for us to try to strengthen your organization when we cannot make any money operating with your miners?"

p. 66, c. 2, l. 11–29.

(309) "Certainly if men in the non-union districts cannot be reached and shown the advantage of belonging to your organization when they are the ones to be benefited, you cannot expect us to do any missionary work among the non-union operators. You can rest assured those gentlemen have not marketed that 12,000,000 tons of coal at a loss. A business does not grow and expand when it is worked at a loss. They are marketing that coal at a satisfactory price, and they have taken the market away from operators who are working with union labor."

p. 67, c. 1, l. 15–30.

(310) "Mr. Perry said, and I believe he meant what he said, that he had no more use for those people than we had. He said if we would make an argeement to hire no one except members of your organization, you on your part would make an agreement that your men would not work for operators not members of the association. I don't believe we could maintain that position before the public, and I fear you would have more or less trouble in delivering the goods. In the mines that are working non-union here today you will find a great many of your men. If they will go to work in non-union mines, your members working for operators outside of the association would not stay out as long as the independent operators were willing to pay the scale we pay. I don't think, however, there would be anything unfair or out of line in insisting that those operators pay a scale of wages that would bring their cost up to the cost of the association operators. I think you gentlemen ought to give that proposition consideration and give us some assurance that you will help us along those lines."

p. 67, c. 2, l. 11–40.

(311) "Mr. Peabody:—I proposed in the Indianapolis joint convention what I thought the proper solution. I will read from the records what I said:

'I move that the solution of this whole proposition be reached by adopting the lowest scale of wages we can find for all classes of labor in the mines that are not union mines; the operators to adopt as their selling price the lowest selling prices they can find in the competitive fields that have not been unionized. In that way, gentlemen, we would carry the war into the enemy's camp and get results. If that was carried through, in less than six months there would not be a non-union miner in the United States and not an operator that would not be driven into our association. It is the only logical way of settling the question.'

"Do you want me to read your reply, Mr. Walker?

"Mr. Walker: That is not necessary. I know what I said.

"Mr. Peabody: Why is it not a good proposition?

"Mr. Walker: I cannot agree with Mr. Peabody that he is right. He says that in six months there would not be a non-union miner in the country. I am satisfied that in six months there would not be a union miner, because they could not pay dues. Mr. Peabody is always willing to settle matters at the other fellow's cost.

"In his statement Mr. Bush said that one reason why he could not go before the operators of non-union mines is because the companies we are doing business with have been working for the last two years at a loss, or at least without any profits. I expected he would go on and finish the statement and go on and say, as all the other operators who have taken the floor have said, that the reason they could not go into competition with operators of non-union mines was because of the cheap labor the non-union operators employed. It is reasonable to suppose that temporarily, while getting the first ones to come in, they could not hold out very strong inducements, but if they would all come in they would be able to decide what profits they were entitled to on their investments, and then sell coal in such a way they could get that profit, they might be able to induce them to come in.

"Mr. Bush: You cannot very well go to a man and say to him, 'I am not making any money in my business, but I want you to come in and conduct your business in the same way I do because you are making a little money.' That will not appeal to him very strongly.

"Mr. Walker: The miners have spent millions of dollars trying to get those men to come into the organization.

"Mr. Bush: I know you have, and that is one of the things I cannot understand. I cannot understand why you would have any difficulty in converting your people to come into the organization when you can show it is for their advance and when you have a record of what you have done for those that are in.

"Mr. Mitchell: They would come in if the operators would let them.

"Mr. Walker: I don't want to suggest anything that is illegal, but there is no reason on earth why the bituminous operators cannot make just as good profits as the anthracite operators do except their refusal to conduct business as the anthracite operators do.

"Mr. Bush: You can get six men to agree on something better than you can six thousand.

"Mr. Walker: If the principle is the same there is no reason why they should not agree. I cannot see why you should abuse us for not getting those men in line and compelling their operators to pay prices that will allow you to compete and make a profit, when we are spending millions of dollars, working hard, getting our heads busted and living in the penitentiary in an effort to do that, while you refuse to even mention the matter to the men on the other side. It hardly looks reasonable.

"Mr. Bush: We are not abusing you for that.

"Mr. Walker: There is no doubt that if you could get them in you would be in as good position to increase your profits as we would be to increase our wages if we get the miners in. The only reason why we are in trouble all the time and why you are in trouble all the time is that they are not in."

p. 68, c. 1, l. 52–66.
p. 69, c. 1, l. 1–39.

(312) "We have all had more or less to say about the competitive position of Illi[illegible] lately, and I think you will all agree that a state situated as Illinois is, right at the threshhold of the big markets of this country, ought to have a bigger proportion of the tonnage than it has been receiving. If Illinois had as favorable conditions of mining as the eastern states, for instance Ohio and western Pennsylvania, the tonnage would unquestionably be from sixty to seventy-five millions instead of less than forty million tons a year. It occupies the best position, so far as the markets are concerned, of any State that has the coal to fill these markets. Iowa is favorably situated in this respect, but it has not the coal. Illinois, of course, has an unlimited amount of coal. You all know that last year Illinois decreased its tonnage into its Chicago markets very materially, while every other State shipping in there increased its shipments very materially. Chicago is a natural market for a large part of the Illinois coal, and it is being driven out of that market very largely because we cannot compete with other States. The greatest market for our company used to be in Chicago. We used to ship thousands of tons of coal into that market daily, you might say. For the past few years we have been gradually forced out of it on account of our inability to compete with other coal."

p. 70, c. 2, l. 14–51.

(313) "9th. As rapidly as the requisite corps of competent engineers is provided at the different mines, the engineers shall become members of the United Mine Workers of America, and thereafter only members thereof shall be employed as hoisting engineers when such members, competent to fill the positions, can be obtained."

p. 107, c. 2, l. 24–32.

AGREEMENT.

Wages and Conditions to Govern Coal Hoisting Engineers in Illinois from June 1, 1906, to March 31, 1908.

Excerpts from book entitled "PROCEEDINGS OF THE EIGHTEENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA: Held in the city of Indianapolis, Ind.: January Fifteenth to Twenty-second inclusive: Nineteen seven.

This book is otherwise known in the record of the case of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company against John Mitchell and others as Plaintiff's Documentary Exhibit No. 4. [Record pp. 706, 290.]

(314) "In any event, the conferences in the bituminous fields adjourned again without an agreement and the interstate movement, which had been the hope and protection of both miners and operators for many years was dissolved. Thereupon, the miners in separate convention declared that on and after April 1st all men should cease work except those employed by operators who by contract agreed to restore the scale of 1903, plus an advance of three cents a ton in the southwestern states. It was also declared that the miners of outlying districts in the bituminous fields not represented in either of the interstate conferences, whose scale of wages expired on April 1st, should cease work and remain in idleness until the scale of 1903 was restored."

p. 36, l. 35–46.

(315) "From 1897 to 1906, the operators and the miners of the central competitive field representing a production of over one hundred million tons of coal annually, or about one-third of all the bituminous coal produced in the United States, have met in annual or biennial joint conference and have, by mutual agreement, fixed the wages and conditions of employment in a manner that was reasonably satisfactory to all concerned. It is true that in arriving at conclusions neither side secured all it desired or all it believed itself entitled to, but on the whole the policy of joint agreements was so far preferable to the old system of annual or biennial strikes and lockouts that the compensating advantages to each so greatly outweighed the losses and vexations occasioned by strikes as to make this method of adjusting wage differences vastly superior to the one it succeeded.

"Now that the smoke of battle has cleared away and the passions and prejudices naturally engendered by contest and conflict have been allayed, it seems to me that in the light of our past experience it would be not only good business policy, but also our duty to each other and to society, to take steps to renew our former relations and re-establish the joint interstate conference; and with that end in view I recommend that the International Executive Board, with the co-operation of the district officers in interest, negotiate with the operators of the central competitive field, during the present year, for an interstate meeting to be held at some suitable time prior to the first of April, 1908. Happily, the interstate movement in the southwest has been preserved, the miners and operators of that field having agreed to meet in Kansas City in the spring of 1908."

President Mitchell.
p. 38, l. 40–45.
p. 39, l. 1–23.

(316) "In West Virginia we have had almost continuous litigation. To such an extent has this been the case that the International Executive Board has retained at an annual salary a strong firm of lawyers, who not only defend our interests against the aggression of our opponents, but who have also vigorously and successfully prosecuted innumerable violators of the law."

President Mitchell.
p. 40, l. 7–12.

(317) "Owing to the depletion of our treasury in the middle of the year (due to the payment of strike benefits), and to a change in the organizing policy in the Irwin and Connellsville fields of Pennsylvania and in West Virginia, our force of organizers was largely reduced; as a consequence, the expense incident to field work was not as great as heretofore."

p. 42, l. 2–7.

(318) "In preparing this report I have confined myself as closely as possible to those matters which I deemed to be of greatest moment and of most importance to our trade, but in closing I shall ask your indulgence to make some observations upon a matter which, while somewhat extraneous, is nevertheless so inseparably related to our movement that it comes properly within the purview of this address.

"I refer to the attitude of the American labor movement and to my own position in regard to the political situation as it presented itself during the recent campaign.

"You, no doubt, recall that a manifesto was issued by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, calling upon the organized workers and their friends to support those candidates for legislative positions who held a paid up card in the organization of their craft, and to defeat all candidates, regardless of party affiliations, whose hostility to the measures favored by organized labor was well known. The action of our own convention one year ago in amending the constitution so as to enable salaried international, district and sub-district officers to hold legislative positions seemed to harmonize entirely with the non-partisan political policy of the American Federation of Labor.

"Acting upon this hypothesis, I encouraged members and officers of our organization to seek nomination for legislative positions and advised our members to support such candidates without regard to party affiliation. Whether my advice in this respect was potential or not, I am not prepared to say. I do know, however, that a large number of miners and other trade unionists in mining districts became candidates and secured nominations for membership in the state legislatures and in the Congress of the United States. I have not learned the number of miners elected to the various state legislatures, but I do know that in Pennsylvania alone more miners were elected to the General Assembly in the last campaign than even the most enthusiastic had predicted. And I am sure that every member of our organization and every trade unionist in the United States feels proud of the fact that your International Secretary-Treasurer and the President of District No. 1, Brothers Wilson and Nichols, were elected triumphantly to Congress. Of course, it is not necessary to say that the first duty of these representatives is to their constituents in the congressional districts from which they were elected, and to the people in general of the United States; but the fact remains that this is the first time in the history of our country when men have been elected to Congress who by experience, training and sympathy will be in a position to voice our demands and to advocate the measures especially required for the protection of the underground toilers of the nation.

"I am firmly convinced that the time is not far distant when the organized workmen of America will have representation in the national and state legislatures in proportion to their numbers and to their industrial importance.

"It must not be assumed, however, that a large representation in our legislative bodies will render less necessary the organizations of labor. On the contrary, the power and influence of our representatives will depend in no small degree upon the strength and solidarity of the organized labor movement; but we must exercise great care that the movement to place labor men in legislative positions is not permitted to degenerate into a mad scramble for office. Partisanship and self-interest or personal aggrandizement must be discouraged and frowned upon. Only those who have proved by good work that they have the real interests of labor at heart should receive countenance and endorsement."

President Mitchell.
p. 50, l. 5–44.
p. 51, l. 1–21.

(319) "The calling of a Special National Convention, the modified proposition submitted by the miners' representatives and accepted by certain Operators, and the final action of our own convention to sign local or district agreements is known to you."

(320) "While there has been a large loss in membership during the past year, there has been a steady increase in the membership the past several months, and yet there is a tremendous loss in our membership compared to what it was a year ago."

p. 57, l. 1–3.

(321) "Until last year I have supported the views of others and endorsed policies recommended to our members, even though I did not believe those policies were for the best interests of the mine workers of the country. Even last year, after the Special National Convention had agreed upon a policy of signing local or district agreements. I worked as earnestly as any member or officer of the Organization for the success of that policy and I challenge a successful contradiction of this statement."

p. 57, l. 22–30.

(322) "I have been an active member of, and assisted in the work of building up, three National Organizations of mine workers. I had also the honor of being one of the delegates that attended the Convention which laid the foundation of the United Mine Workers of America."

p. 58, l. 1–6.

(323) "I believe when the United Mine Workers was instituted that it was to be a National Organization. For years the mine workers of this country have struggled against tremendous opposition to establish a National Organization, National in name, National in purpose and to adopt National methods to deal with National questions affecting the interests of the miners.

"Is the United Mine Workers of America a National Organization in more than name? Does it deal properly with National questions affecting the miners' interests? Can we hope to establish a National eight hour day and our right to organize in certain districts except by a National movement? These are questions the miners of the country must seriously consider.

"Two years ago, or when a reduction was accepted in 1904, the members of our Union were led to believe that all contracts would be made to terminate on the same date, so that we would be prepared to meet and dispose of any issue that confronted us in 1906. At the date of the expiration of the agreement in the Southwest, I made a special effort to have changed to conform with other contracts which expired April 1, 1906, and as a result, this contract was made for a period of nineteen months.

"It was on that date that the miners expected to establish recognition of the United Mine Workers in the Anthracite region. It was on that date that we hoped to establish a uniform eight hour day in Central Pennsylvania. It was on that date that the miners of the Irwin and Connellsville Districts would have joined in a National movement to free themselves from the conditions that have existed so many years in those districts. It was on that date that the opportunity presented itself to establish Hocking Valley prices and conditions in the Pittsburg District, according to promises made in Chicago in 1898. It was on that date that the mine workers of West Virginia would have swung into line and asserted their right to be members of the United Mine Workers."

(324) "If the United Mine Workers is a National Organization, it should establish National reforms and make them apply to all alike.

"If national reforms, to be established in the mining industry, require a national movement, then those reforms cannot be established by a sectional effort. This has been proven by the millions of dollars we have spent in that kind of an effort in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama and Colorado.

"If States or districts are allowed and directed to legislate for themselves on questions of a National character, then there is no need for a National Organization of miners.

"Regardless of what may have been said by some members of the United Mine Workers, even some who hold official position, I am a firm believer in an International organization of our craft. In fact, the American continent is not large enough to maintain two Organizations of miners.

"These things are mentioned for the benefit of the United Mine Workers of the country. With this information you will understand that there is work to do, if we desire to maintain what we now have and to bring the unorganized mine workers up to our standard.

"To clear the minds of all the mine workers of the country and to strangle many falsehoods that are being circulated in regard to my position on the policy of the United Mine Workers of America, I desire to make clear at this time, that"

p. 61, l. 13–37.

(325) "I favor:

"1. One Organization of the mine workers of the American Continent.

"2. I favor the establishment of a National eight hour day for every person employed in and around the mines.

"3. I favor a complete recognition of our right to organize in every mining district in the country.

"4. I recognize that there are certain local markets that naturally belong to certain coal producing districts.

"5. I favor giving every operator an equal opportunity to secure his share of the general markets."

(326) "Secretary-Treasurer W. B. Wilson read the following report:

"Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention:

"I herewith submit for your consideration my financial report for the year ending November 30, 1906:

"Beginning with the first of April we had for a prolonged period over 400,000 men on strike. We had on hand in the International treasury at the close of business March 31, 1906, $361,951.87. It must be apparent to everyone, as it was to the International Executive Board, that this amount of money was insufficient to take care of all the men who were idle as a result of our failure to reach an agreement with the operators. Consequently it was decided to hold the money in the International treasury until the various locals, sub-districts and districts had exhausted their funds, and if they had not secured a settlement by that time, to use the funds in the International treasury at those points where assistance was most needed and where it would best protect the interests of all. Fortunately, many settlements were arrived at before it was necessary to draw much on the International treasury.

"District No. 2, Central Pennsylvania, and District No. 6, Ohio, were the last ones to secure a settlement and all of the International funds were expended in those two districts in the last few weeks of the conflict. This policy was absolutely necessary because it cannot be gainsaid that if the miners of either of those districts had been defeated it would ultimately have been disastrous to all of the miners of the United States.

"As a matter of fact, at the close of business July 11, we had expended $37,707.59 more money than we had in the treasury. The International Executive Board at its meeting in June, realizing the necessity for more funds with which to conduct the strike, levied an asseeement of 50 cents per week upon those who were at work, beginning with the 15th of June. Only $195.80 was realized from this assessment during the month of June, and very little until after the middle of July, when the payments for work performed in June were being made. In this crisis your International Officers began negotiations with districts that were known to have money in their treasuries to induce them to pay their assessments in bulk for all of their Locals. On the 12th of July the first payment in this manner was made by District No. 12 of Illinois, amounting to $100,000.00. District 13, Iowa, followed soon after with $35,000.00, and as settlements had been secured for a majority of the men in Ohio and Central Pennsylvania by that time, our financial crisis had passed.

"With the large number of men we had on strike and the comparatively small amount we had in the treasury we were unable to contribute sufficient money to the various districts to enable them to pay very large strike benefits. This created dissatisfaction and the question was frequently asked, 'What has become of our money?'"

(328) "President Mitchell: The chair does not want to consume the time of the convention, but there is one feature of the question you should understand. It was upon a recommendation made by myself, which was incorporated in one of my annual reports, that the separate organizations of mechanical trades were broken up and the men compelled to become members of the United Mine Workers of America. It was through Mr. Duncan and myself, in the American Federation of Labor, that the autonomy resolution which gives us jurisdiction over these trades was written. It was by my advice that the officials of Indiana told the engineers they would have to leave their separate union and join ours."

"President Mitchell: The local unions have a right to place fines on members for violation of their rules."

(330) "Delegate John T. Dempsey, for the Committee on Officers' Reports, presented the following report:

Indianapolis, Ind., Jan. 18, 1907.

To the Officers and Delegates of the Eighteenth Annual Convention. Greeting:

We, your Committee on Officers' Reports, beg leave to report that we have carefully examined the reports of our President, Vice President and Secretary-Treasurer."

p. 269, l. 38–45.

(331) "POLICY OF THE FUTURE.

"Your committee approves of our President's recommendation on this vital question, and would also recommend that our International officers be empowered to negotiate with the operators of the central competitive field for an interstate meeting, to be held some time prior to the expiration of our present contracts. We further recommend that this convention instruct our officers to make a reasonable effort to secure the admission of all soft coal producing States desiring admission to the joint interstate movement."

p. 270, l. 17–25.

(332) "BOARD MEETINGS AND ORGANIZERS.

"Your committee recommend that this convention heartily approve of the Board's action in withdrawing a part of our organizing force from active service, as a result of a depleted treasury, but we further recommend that the force be increased whenever, in the discretion of the Board, our funds would warrant.

Delegate John T. Dempsey.
p. 270, l. 38–40.
p. 271, l. 1–3.

(333) "The motion to adopt the report of the Committee on Officers' Reports was carried by a unanimous vote.

"Delegate Dempsey, for the Committee, read the following report on the report of Vice-President Lewis:

VICE-PRESIDENT.

"We, your committee, after careful deliberation on Vice-President Lewis' report, would say that the same shows that our Vice-President was actively engaged during the year, and rendered valuable service to the organization in negotiating settlements of wage and other questions.

"Vice-President Lewis' report not being classified, your committee can only deal with the same in a general way.

"The Vice-President's review of the events that took place subsequent to our convention last spring, as mentioned in his report, are his own personal opinions. However, your committee reserves the same right to their opinions, and we disagree with our Vice-President in his report as to the wisdom of pursuing certain lines of action, and particularly the attitude of our Vice-President on the signing of sectional agreements in the several states. That results might have been more advantageous to our organization had a different policy been adopted is merely problematical and conjecture. The policy pursued was in harmony with the deliberate judgment of our last special convention. Taking into consideration the many complications confronting us at that time, together with the demoralized condition of our joint forces and a chaotic state of affairs on every hand existing as a result of the strained relations between the two divergent forces—operators and miners—we believe that the very best possible results have been attained under the circumstances, and congratulate our organization upon the fact that it has emerged from the conflict with honor and our organization has been preserved intact.

"Hence your committee recommends a continuation in the future of the same wise, conservative, business-like policies."

"Delegate J. H. Walker—I move the adoption of the report of the Committee on Officers' Report. (Seconded.)"

p. 272, l. 19–45.
p. 273, l. 1–8.

(334) "Had I believed that a national strike would have involved the miners of West Virginia, of Virginia, of Meyersdale, Pa., of the Georges Creek District of Maryland, of the Connellsville, the West Penn Road and the Irwin Field in Western Pennsylvania, had I believed it would have involved the men of Alabama, of Colorado, of Utah, of Wyoming, of Washington—had I believed you could have stopped those non-union mines there would no one have favored a national strike more than I. But I did not believe it then, and I do not believe it now. I do not believe a national strike would have stopped any considerable number of men in any of the non-union fields of this country."

p. 275, l. 31–42.

(335) "In the middle of April the International Executive Board held a meeting in this city. The question of our policy was under consideration. An application has been received from Ohio asking what we should do in the Crooksville District, if I remember right. A sub-committee consisting of the Vice-President, the Secretary-Treasurer and myself were appointed to define a policy for the government of our various district organizations, so far as settlements were concerned, and this is what we unanimously reported to the Board, and it was unanimously adopted by them:

"'We are of the opinion that the representatives of our organization should demand a full restoration of prices and conditions of employment which prevailed in 1903, and, in addition thereto, should retain any advantages secured in 1904 and 1905. If, however, it becomes apparent to the responsible officer in charge of the miners' interests in any conference with the operators, that an agreement on this basis cannot be reached the Board believe and advise that where operators are willing to pay the advance provided for in the Perry resolution, to-wit: five cents per ton on screened coal, three cents per ton on run-of-mine, four cents per ton for machine mining in Ohio, the restoration of the machine mining rate in Indiana and Illinois, an advance of 5 9-10 per cent. on dead work and yardage prices, rather than engage in a strike, settlements should be effected even though we are forced to accept the conditions of 1904 and 1905, plus the advance referred to herein.

"'This information is not to be communicated to our membership, but is intended solely for the guidance of the officers having general supervision over the making of agreements.'"

p. 278, l. 13–41.

(336) "I desire to say with reference to the strikes of 1894 and 1897, that the strike of 1894 took place at a time in the history of this country when there was a great depression in industry. That strike took place on a falling market. That strike ended in a compromise. In the strike of 1897, or during the period of which it is said the production of West Virginia coal increased to such a large extent, it is a well known fact that there were approximately nineteen thousand men working in the mines of West Virginia. It is also a well known fact that there were twelve thousand of those men on strike during the strike period. It is also a well known fact that when we met in Columbus, Ohio, to consider a compromise proposition with the operators that the West Virginia delegation was in that convention, and that for two days and a part of another the delegates from Illinois and the delegates from Ohio stood side by side in demanding that there be no settlement unless the men in West Virginia were included. It is also a well known fact that a compromise resolution was offered. As a result of that resolution, which read that we would accept the compromise offered by the operators, the miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois would not return to work for ten days in order to give the West Virginia men an opportunity to make a contract. It is a well known fact that because of the wording of that resolution the West Virginia men believed their interests were being protected and voted it and carried it in the convention by a bare majority, and when some one, realizing what was at stake, asked for a reconsideration of that motion, Mr. Ratchford said it was too late, it had gone to the press of the country. What was the result? There could be but one result. The West Virginia men went home without a settlement. Some of the men in the other States went to work before the end of the ten days. Our brothers in Illinois continued to strike. Following that period this organization put men in the field to boycott the coal coming from West Virginia. And this is another opinion of mine, that the boycott was placed on West Virginia coal, and our men going into the markets of different sections of the country saying to the public 'Don't buy West Virginia coal because it is produced by non-union men; don't buy it because it is produced cheaper than union coal,' did more to advertise West Virginia coal than any strike that ever took place in this country.

"So far West Virginia has continued to increase its production by leaps and bounds, so much so that there are probably more than fifty thousand men working in that State. Their product crosses ours in the market, and, while I respect the opinion of every man, while I respect President Mitchell's opinion, that does not necessarily mean I should be deprived of expressing mine. And my judgment is based upon past experience. When we organize West Virginia, when we organize the unorganized sections of Pennsylvania, we will organize them by a strike movement.

Some man will say this is a matter to be determined by the future. That is true; but while it is true, coal from those States is crossing the union States and going into the markets that we ought to supply. If evidence is needed, we have only to refer to the coal reports of the union States to see that there is not the increase in their production they ought to have, notwithstanding the fact they have home markets."

(337) "At the last special convention held in the city of Indianapolis, we were confronted with a serious situation. The convention decided by a majority vote the policy that would be pursued, although many delegates did not believe that was the best policy that could be pursued. I was one of them. I believe that better and more speedy results could have been secured by reaffirming and reiterating the famous Ryan resolution that was adopted at the convention in January."

Delegate Green.
p. 285, l. 1–7.

(338) "In referring to the National suspension of 1897 I desire to refresh your memories by saying to you that the result of the National suspension of that year, in addition to what President Mitchell has said, and in addition to what Vice-President Lewis has said, was the cause of the revival of the joint agreement, which has been of so much benefit to all of us. For some years previous to 1897 that agreement had been dissolved. That strike, in addition to securing for us an advance in wages and the re-establishment of the joint movement, provided for a convention a few months later to be held in Chicago. That convention secured to the United Mine Workers of this country an eight-hour day. This result, secured in Chicago in 1898, can be traced to and identified with the results of the National suspension of 1897. In addition to that it gave an impetus to the organization. It created in some of the unorganized fields a sentiment in favor of organization, and in others crystallized a sentiment already existing there. After the suspension of 1897 the organization went forward in leaps and bounds.

"One reason why I believe a National suspension would have brought the best and most speedy result is because, as you know and as I know, and as subsequent events have proved, it would have prevented the dissolution of the interstate movement. I am exceedingly desirous of seeing the joint movement re-established, and will do all that is in my power to bring about that most desirable result. I recommended to our convention in Columbus last week that they instruct the officers to co-operate with the National and do all in their power to bring about the re-establishment of the interstate joint movement."

(339) "If I do not understand the report of the committee, I want to understand it. I believe their recommendation is, after summing up the report of Vice-President Lewis, that the same wise, conservative policy be pursued in the future that has been pursued in the past. I would like to know whether or not that means to commit this organization to the same policy, no matter what the circumstances or conditions are, that are pursued in the last general settlement. I would like to know whether or not the adoption of the report of the committee would mean that we commit ourselves to at all times in the future adopt a policy of settling by sections? If that is the intention of the committee, I don't believe the organization can afford to commit itself to such a policy. Conditions may change and circumstances arise which may cause some subsequent convention to deem it wise to declare in favor of a National settlement. If that is true, will this convention commit itself absolutely and unreservedly to a policy of sectional settlements? We cannot afford to do that, because the operators of the country would take advantage of such a declaration and say to us when we seek to again establish the joint interstate movement, 'You have gone on record as favoring the same policy that was pursued last year, and we claim the same right to make our settlements sectionally and locally and follow out the policy you have already laid down.'

"I say to you, gentlemen, one reason why I oppose the policy that was pursued last year was because over in Ohio we were peculiarly situated. We had West Virginia on the south and Pennsylvania on the east, and after four months of a strike in Eastern Ohio we had reached the danger line. We felt keenly the competition from West Virginia, and during the suspension our miners in Ohio chafed under the object lesson they had. They saw West Virginia coal go by, trainload after trainload passing their doors, when they were on strike. This coal supplied the markets that they should have had. There is no disguising the fact, something must be done to remedy this condition. Year after year Ohio has had to go home and strike in some portion of the district to enforce the interstate agreement that was signed up here. Ohio, because of her peculiar location, has been an impregnable defense for the States west, and has met successfully and resisted to a man the going westward of the conditions in Pennsylvania and West Virginia. If West Virginia increased her tonnage one million tons in 1897, reports show that last year she increased it five million tons, and has taken from Ohio many local markets she has claimed, and has had a right to claim. Reports show that Pennsylvania increased her production about two-thirds the tonnage of Ohio. While this increase in production has been going on in their districts, Ohio has been practically standing still. Do you then wonder that in Ohio some means for bringing about better results is uppermost in the minds of our people? I confess here and now that the overwhelming sentiment in Ohio was that a settlement by sections would not correct the conditions we complained of.

"Now, something must be done; it is absolutely necessary to protect us against the competition that comes from the unorganized fields east of us. I believe a National movement would have induced West Virginia to become organized and that, like other districts in 1897, it would have meant the organizing of that field. That would have brought us the protection we so richly deserve, and that is so absolutely necessary for us to have. Even during the suspension there developed a pronounced sentiment among our people in Ohio in some localities where they were on strike in favor of stopping even those who had signed the 1903 scale."

(340) "As to the main issue that is being discussed, I disagree with Vice-President Lewis and President Green of Ohio. Since the time of the National convention all the information I have been able to secure has convinced me that the policy advocated by them would have been disastrous to the organization, and that the policy we adopted was the very best that could have been adopted at that time and under the conditions then existing. From the knowledge I have gained in the past year, added to what little I knew prior to that time, if the same question came up in this meeting, not only would I do what I did then, but if there was anything I could conceive of, no matter what would have been the result to me as an individual, to prevent the policy advocated by those two brothers being adopted, I would do that in addition to what I did before.

"I have been coming to these conventions for a long time, and on some matters, I have been set down, particularly by some of the men interested in this question, as an impractical dreamer. I want to say that I have been fully prepared to meet these people, and I say now if ever there was an impractical dream advocated, if ever there was an absolute absurdity advocated, if ever there was an idea advocated that meant, if we were to adopt it, the annihilation of this organization, it was the one they stood for, the putting into force at any cost of the Ryan resolution. The Ryan resolution provided that we would all sign up or we would all refuse to sign up. I don't believe there is a man in our organization, or outside of it, I don't believe there is even a socialist in the country, who is foolish enough to attempt to get up before any body of men who have had experience in this movement and say that resolution could have been put into effect. The proposition itself as advocated by these people is almost as foolish as the position they are taking that the adoption of the report of the Committee on Officers' Reports would commit this organization to a set policy when acting on such questions in the future. I think it is clearly the intent of the committee to endorse the position taken by the organization in the past in dealing with such questions. In dealing with some of these questions in the past a National suspension has been ordered, and, so far as the organization could control things, settlements were made nationally. Last year sectional settlements were made, but in both cases the men who considered the matter carefully did the best that could be done under the circumstances. That is the policy the report of the committee endorses, and that is what the report of the committee provides for a continuance of."

Delegate J. H. Walker.
p. 289, l. 21–46.
p. 290, l. 1–17.

(341) "The original scale that was drafted as a National proposition put the Western Pennsylvania, the Ohio, the two Indiana districts and the Illinois operators on a competitive basis. It was understood that if one of them got an advantage it would disturb that equitable basis."

Delegate J. H. Walker.
p. 290, l. 31–35.

(342) "I want to say to you frankly that, notwithstanding their statements, if you will leave the report of Vice President Lewis in the hands of an impartial judge, a man with a knowledge of the facts in the case as they affect our organization, and ask him if it is an honest personal opinion or an attack on President Mitchell and the men who believe in the policy adopted at the last convention, I am satisfied he would decide it was about the ablest attack of that character that could be made under the circumstances. I believe that ninety-nine out of every one hundred such impartial men would so decide.

"Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to give some consideration to the question of a National suspension. The National suspension in 1897 and the suspension in 1906 were two entirely different propositions. The markets were against us in 1906, which was not the condition in 1897. So much for that portion of the report.

"Now I want to ask any man, even the most idle dreamer on earth, who knows anything about the situation in Western Pennsylvania, the situation in the Connellsville coke region, the situation in West Virginia and Virginia, would any action taken by this convention be the means of getting those men out on strike? I put in two years in that region myself, and while I do not claim to know everything in connection with it, I do know something of that field. In 1897 Fred Dilcher started in at one end of the Kanawha and went right through the region. He was allowed to talk in the camps and every man was allowed to form his own opinion. I would like to see the man who would start in at the top of Kanawha and go to New River and talk to those men now. About the time you leave Cincinnati going up there you would get a pretty able body guard to attend you. There would not be a minute of your time after leaving Cincinnati until you got into Virginia when you would not be watched. They have complete control of the surface of the land in that state where we are interested. They have complete control of the judges, of the juries, the police force, the militia and all the thugs they want up there. They have plenty of deputy sheriffs, each one with a commission, a big forty-five, and a big club, but if you take a club and a gun along you will get fifty dollars and sixty days, and if you don't take them along you will get your brains beaten out. If a coal miner says, 'Hello, Jack, how are you?' from across the street he gets his time next morning. The mines are distant from the towns and the majority of them are not even reached by a public road. The only stores there are company stores, and the minute the men come out on strike they are prevented from getting anything, except what is brought to them. I don't care how good a man is, or how strong his union principles, or how willing he is to strike, unless you can furnish means for him to keep his family alive it is impossible to keep him out. I agree with President Green and Vice President Lewis that you never can get those men organized except at the end of a general strike, but I warn you not to go into it until you are thoroughly prepared. If you are not prepared to take care of those men when you call them out, you will only victimize the poor fellows who have the courage to join you and have them driven out of there. I ask any man who has any knowledge of the situation if, even during the two months suspension last year, he believes there was enough money in the organization to have carried on that sort of fight in West Virginia, old Virginia and Maryland? There was not enough money, even if we took every cent in the national treasury and every cent in the district treasuries, and did not give a cent to our own members.

"When I see people who will adopt questionable tactics to push themselves to the front, I confess I have not much respect for them. I do not say that we had such people in the case we are discussing, I merely make the general statement, but I do not want to say to you frankly and freely that I believe the policy outlined by our last special convention on the proposition that was up for settlement was the very best that could be adopted. I believe a majority of the men who were conducting negotiations lost sight of their own interests entirely and tried to do only what was best for the organization. I believe if the other policy had been adopted the same men would have gone into the fight and would have done the very best they could to win. I don't believe there is a man who voted for that settlement on the other side who would have attempted to criticise those actions until the final result had been brought about, and I believe there would have been no harsh criticism of any individual, even if the result proved disastrous. I don't believe the practice of throwing cold water on the efforts of the men who have to carry out the policies we adopt is the proper thing to do."

Delegate J. H. Walker.

p. 294, l. 1–34.

(343) "If we are able at a colliery to force all the men to become members of the union we do so. If we are too weak, we do not attempt it, but keep gradually working among the men until we are able to accomplish our end."

Delegate Patrick Gilday.
p. 295, l. 24–27.

(344) "I am one of those who believe that the policy adopted last year, that of settling where we could make settlements on the 1903 scale, was the proper thing to do."

p. 296, l. 6–8.

(345) "Now, Mr. President, I have no fault to find with Vice-President Lewis. Our relationship is friendly, but I do not believe he has a right to embody in his annual report such statements as he has without questioning the district or sub-district officers in Central Pennsylvania in regard to conditions there. If he had done that he would have discovered that he had been misinformed. I object to the statements that we have just now established the open shop, and that we have only a limited check-off. I hope Vice-President Lewis will correct his statements in regard to these matters."

Delegate Patrick Gilday.
p. 296, l. 23–32.

(346) "The future alone will determine whether or not the position of last year was correct. It is not a question of President Mitchell's policy, it is not a question of Vice-President Lewis' policy; the future will determine what policy we will be required to adopt in order to best preserve and safeguard the interests of the mine workers of this country. In doing this it will be necessary for the mine workers of this country to know all the facts in regard to all the conditions in the mining industry from one end of the land to the other. No one has made the statement that we can organize West Virginia without a strike. If we can I will be one of the best pleased men in this organization, whether I am an official or whether I am working in the interests of the men while serving them in the ranks. That has been my position in the past and it will be my position in the future. In whatever position I am serving the miners of this country there won't be any differences of opinion between my colleagues and myself when the miners have determined on a policy; but in order that all the men may know what conditions prevail in the country, I believe as one of their representatives, I would be lax in my duty, that I would not be doing justice to the men who are struggling for improved conditions, if I did not point out to them the obstacles in the way of success, and what, in my opinion, would bring that success."

p. 310, l. 5–27.

(347) "President Mitchell: It was not my intention to speak again upon the subject under consideration; but in making my short address yesterday in defense of the policy adopted by your convention one year ago, and executed by your district and international officers, I failed to call attention to some features I believe would be of interest to you.

"Let me say, prefatory to presenting them to you, that I have repeatedly stated that, in my opinion, West Virginia, the Irwin field, the Connellsville coke region, Southern Colorado and the Georges Creek district would not be thoroughly organized except as the result of a successful strike. I repeat that opinion now; but I want to add to it that they will not be organized at all, strike or no strike, unless we are able to support the men in those fields from the first day they lay down their tools. One year ago that was a consideration with me. I didn't believe they would have struck then. I don't believe it now, and if they had struck you would have had no money to support them and no resources from which to draw revenue, because when the union men were on strike you had cut off the only source of revenue."

p. 310, l. 28–46.

(348) "Now I believe it is possible, indeed I believe it is probable, that in the not distant future we will be able to inaugurate a movement in West Virginia and the other unorganized fields that will involve them in a strike, and then we will expect you to furnish the sinews of war, as you have done in the past, to keep these men in idleness."

President Mitchell.
p. 311, l. 1–6.

(349) "If one year hence it is my judgment that a suspension of mining throughout the United States would be best, I will favor that policy. If, on the other hand, I am of the opinion that partial settlements are best, I will favor partial settlements."

President Mitchell.
p. 313, l. 7–11.

(350) "This morning Delegate Walker spoke of the Ryan resolution. While that was a very drastic measure it was carried by very nearly a unanimous vote of the convention. One man opposed it but he has since been relegated to the rear for opposing that resolution and voting in another manner when he went into the joint convention. We knew when we were voting for that resolution we were doing the right thing. We believed it still when we met here in special convention in March. The miners of Ohio believe it now."

Delegate G. W. Savage.
p. 323, l. 45, 46.
p. 324, l. 1–7.

(351) "When we founded the United Mine Workers we intended that we should, if one State had to be called out, call out all the others with it. We want all the States to come out together, and we want every man to stand by his brother, shoulder to shoulder, to show the operators what we can do. If we don't continue that policy, if we go on settling by sections, we might as well give up the organization. If we don't go together to ask for a settlement we had better abandon the organization and let every one settle for himself."

p. 337, l. 38–46.

(352) "I realize that the unorganized districts of this country not only are a menace to themselves, but they are a menace to the organized workers who wish for better things. How to secure better conditions in those fields is something that is better known to our executive officers than to me. Speaking of the joint movement and its dissolution, I want to refer briefly to the fact that when we were parting after our regular convention last year our demand for recognition was pending. The Ryan resolution of which we have heard so much, had been introduced, but I claim it had served its purpose when we reconvened again in the special convention, although great stress is laid upon the fact that it was in force at that time, and that it was in force even at the end of the joint convention.

However, I want to call the attention of the delegates to the fact that when we came to the special convention and our scale committee renewed its demands, they carried with them a demand that Iowa be admitted to the joint movement. You all know how the interstate conference proceeded to make a scale on the line of the joint movement alone. Now, I speak for my own district when I say that some day we propose to right our own wrongs, and if ever the course of this organization is so shaped that we go on the field of conflict, we want to make that struggle so interesting to every portion of our membership that they will have a healthy interest in working for its final success. We are not without troubles in our own state; we have many difficulties such as I have heard discussed in this meeting, but we do not think this is the proper place to air them. I think such things can better be taken care of in the respective districts than they can after being discussed here. I think our organization has emerged from the crisis of last year with considerable credit, and I believe we will be able to demonstrate that in a practical manner in the future."

(357) "PRESIDENT WATKINS' REPORT.

"To the Officers and Delegates of Sub-District No. 5 of District No. 6, U. M. W. of A.

"Brother Delegates: We have assembled in the ninth annual convention of our sub-district. Before submitting to you my report permit me to heartily congratulate you and our members on the large and splendid representation in this convention.

"One year ago you honored me by electing me president of our sub-district. At that time we were in hopes that we would be able to arrange a wage scale without very much trouble. In this we were disappointed, and succeeded in getting a wage contract signed after a prolonged and bitter strike lasting four months.

"That the greatest strike of the year was not finally settled until after we had held six joint conventions in this sub-district. The first convention was held April 12, 13, and 14, in Wheeling, W. Va. After being in session three days we adjourned without reaching an agreement. The next joint convention was held at Canton, O., April 16, 17 and 18, for the north end of Sub-District. We also failed to reach an agreement for that part of the Sub-District. The next joint convention was held at Wheeling, W. Va.,

April 23 and 24 at which time there was a scale formulated on the basis of the 1903 contract and this scale was signed by a few operators.

"The next joint convention was held at Wheeling, W. Va., June 27, 28, 29 and 30. After four days' session was adjourned without reaching an agreement. We then held another joint convention at Canton, O., July 11, 12 and 13, 19 and 20, at which we succeeded in effecting a settlement for the north end of the sub-district. The last joint convention was held at Wheeling, W. Va., July 24, 25, 26 and 27, at which time a settlement was reached on a basis of the present scale under which our men are now working."

p. 4, l. 26–37.
p. 5, l. 1–24.

(358) "At our last annual convention it was unanimously decided that the Eastern Ohio scale should apply to the West Virginia Pan Handle counties. The operators of those counties refused to meet us in joint convention to sign a general scale. Some of the operators even refused to sign a contract and this resulted in several local strikes, all of which were settled except the one now on at Elm Grove where the men are on strike and are standing firm. It is with regret that some of the locals in the Pan Handle broke away and the members went to work without any union or without getting a scale signed.

"I am of the opinion that there are many good active union men in the Pan Handle counties, and that if we all work together we can organize every mine worker in that section and establish scale rates."

President Watkins' Report.
p. 6, l. 11–25.

(359) "In past conventions there have been many resolutions passed, condemning the practice of working on idle days. It is reported to me that in some mines, this resolution is being violated by our members, who are working on idle days. I would advise that our members adhere strictly to the resolution, and that local unions use every effort to enforce the rule prohibiting men from working on idle days."

President Watkins' Report.

(360) "REPORT OF SECY.-TREAS. LEE RANKIN.

"To the Delegates of the 9th Annual Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6, U. M. W. of A.

"As your Secretary-Treasurer I have the honor and pleasure of submitting to you and the members of sub-district 5, a report of my work with a report of the membership and the finances of this sub-district for the year beginning March 1, 1906, and ending February 28, 1907.

"It is a matter of history that last year was no exception to the rule in Eastern Ohio—that the miners had to strike before a wage contract could be secured.

"We were hopeful, that when partial settlements were made with a few large corporations in Pennsylvania by the United Mine Workers, that there would be an early settlement of our differences in Eastern Ohio. Subsequent developments proved that our hope was without foundation.

"After several attempts to reach an agreement with the Operators of sub-district 5, our members were compelled to strike and that strike developed into the most bitter struggle that has taken place since the formation of our sub-district.

"The failure of the district organizations to provide each striking member with benefits to the amount of $3.00 per week caused considerable friction and this was taken advantage of by the enemies of the organization. What for a time seemed to be division in our ranks encouraged certain operators with the hope that they could crush our organization. In this hope they were doomed to disappointment, as later developments fully demonstrated.

"When the district organization found that they could not comply with the constitution in the payment of strike benefits, a system of paying relief in orders was established. This policy was condemned and denounced by a few men, who did not stop to consider why the system was established.

"After a great deal of work on the part of your representatives, the reason for adopting such a policy was made clear to the members, who then took renewed courage and showed a determination to win in the struggle that then existed.

"With all the obstacles that we had to overcome last year, we have reason to feel proud that sub-district 5 came out of the strike with such credit to itself and the principles of unionism that it represents.

"To the fidelity, unity and activity of the mine workers of this sub-district is due the credit for winning in the struggle of last year. If any mistakes were made in that contest, let us profit by the experience of the past and be that much better prepared for the future."

Cards.

"Section 1. Local Unions shall provide each member with a Due Card, upon which the dues and assessments paid by the member shall be entered, which shall be his receipt for the same.

"Sec. 2. Due Cards shall not admit any person to membership from one local to another, and to protect the membership of individuals who are unable to pay their dues because of no Local existing where they reside, the International, District and Sub-District Secretaries shall, upon the payment of dues and assessments by said member, issue the usual cards for the same; provided that this shall not apply to a member living in a locality where a Local Union is in existence.

"Sec. 3. No person a member of the organization, who holds a Due or Transfer Card showing him to be a member in good standing, shall be debarred or hindered from obtaining work on account of race, creed or nationality. Cards properly filled out and signed by the officers of miners' unions in foreign countries shall be accepted in lieu of initiation fees.

"Sec. 4. Any member desiring to leave the mine where his Local is located and work elsewhere shall immediately make application to the Secretary of the Local for a Transfer Card, and if he has paid all dues and assessments, the President and Recording Secretary shall issue a Transfer Card to him, which shall be attested by the Financial Secretary, providing the Local Union is in good standing with the International, District and Sub-District Unions, which shall be accepted in any District, and in case such person cannot produce a Transfer Card he shall pay the regular initiation fee. All Transfer Cards shall be deposited as the laws of the District where work is secured may direct.

"Sec. 5. When a person who has not been a member of the organization three months or more secures a Transfer Card from a Local Union in a District where a dispensation has been granted said Transfer Card shall not be accepted by any Local in a different District from the one in which the Local issuing the same is located, unless said Transfer Card is accompanied by an amount equal to the difference between the initiation fee paid by said member and the initiation fee provided for in the District where the card is deposited.

"Sec. 6. No card shall be issued to any member when the Local is three or more months in arrears to the International, District or Sub-District for dues or assessments. Officers of any Local Union issuing cards in violation of any Section of Article VII shall be fined $10.00 for each card issued, the fine to be collected in the same manner as dues and assessments.

"Sec. 7. The Transfer Card must show that the member receiving it has paid all dues and assessments for the month in which it was issued, and must also show at what class of labor he was employed.

"Sec. 8. When a Transfer Card is issued to any member it must be deposited by him with some Local Union or with the International Secretary-Treasurer, within three months after the last day of the month in which it was issued to him, else the card will become void and he can only become a member again by initiation as a new member.

"Sec. 9. When a member presents a Transfer Card to a Local Union at any mine where he works or desires to work, the Local Union must accept the same and admit him to membership in that Local, unless the Local issuing the same is not in good standing, as shown by the monthly report of the Secretary-Treasurer, or the person to whom the card is issued has not been a member of the organization for three months as provided for in Section 5 of this Article, and shall collect from him all dues and assessments from the time between the last day of the month in which the card was issued and the date of depositing the same.

"Sec. 10. The Sub-District, District or International Secretary-Treasurer shall not accept a Transfer Card if the member is where he can deposit it with a Local Union.

"Sec. 11. The International Secretary-Treasurer shall prepare and send out monthly a statement of all Locals three months or more in arrears for dues and assessments, and no Local Union shall refuse to accept a Transfer Card from any Local unless it appears on said list as being in bad standing. Local Unions on strike shall be exempt from the provisions of this section.

"Sec. 12. All Transfer Cards shall be made in book form, with two stubs attached. The books to be numbered, and each card in the book to be numbered and bear the number of the book. The stubs to be printed in conformity with the card itself. The card and one stub to be filled out by the Recording Secretary and certified to by the President and Financial Secretary of the Local Union granting the same; one stub to be retained by the Local issuing the card for future reference, the other stub to accompany the card and must be immediately filled out by the Secretary of the Local where the card is deposited and returned by him to the Secretary of the Local that issued the card.

"Sec. 13. The President, Financial and Recording Secretary of the Local Union shall keep a record of all Transfer Cards bought by, issued by and deposited in their respective Local Unions. The Auditing Committee shall compare their records every three months, and in the presence of the Local Union destroy all Transfer Cards that have been deposited that there is no dispute about."

OFFICIAL MINING SCALE

Of Association of Pittsburgh Vein Operators of Ohio for Their Mines in Belmont, Harrison and Jefferson Counties, Ohio, and the United Mine Workers of America.

RULES AND REGULATIONS.

"All persons accepting employment in these mines hereby agree to be governed by the following Rules and Regulations:

PICK MINING.

Mining, per ton, screened coal..... $0.90
Mining, run of mine coal, per ton..... .64 2-7"

p. 95, l. 1-13.

(423) "GENERAL RULES FOR PICK AND MACHINE MINING.

"Rule 1—Mining entries and entry break-throughs in pick and machine mines drove double shift, extra, per yard, 28c.

"Rule 2—Wet entry shall be paid 28c. per yard extra when it has been fully determined that it is entitled thereto by the miner and mine boss, or by the mine committee and mine superintendent, in case the former do not agree.

"Rule 3—Operators shall take the water out of rooms and entries and have rooms and entries dry at starting time, or pay 4½c. per barrel if the miner has to bail it. Barrels to be placed in rooms and entries, and where barrels cannot be placed in entries, the water box shall be forwarded for the entryman to bail water in.

"Rule 4—Prices to be paid for slate or soapstone coming down unavoidably over the coal shall be agreed upon by the mine boss and miner, and if they fail to agree, it shall be referred to the superintendent, mine boss and mine committee.

"Rule 5—Clay veins and spars shall be paid for, the matter to be referred to miner affected and mine boss. If they fail to agree, the company reserves the right to remove the same and give the miner another place.

"Rule 6—Any rolls or horsebacks coming up in bottom or down in top, shall be paid for as follows, per yard, running with rolls:

"Six to ten inches in thickness, 28c.

"Between ten and seventeen inches, 56c.

"Between seventeen and twenty-three inches, 84c.

"Between twenty-three and twenty-nine inches, $1.12, and rolls of more thickness shall be paid in the same proportion for each six inches.

"Miners shall take up and remove roll when same crosses roadway.

"When roll is so hard as to require drilling and blasting the operator shall furnish one-half and the miner one-half the labor for drilling and blasting.

"Rule 7—Work shall begin at 7.00 a. m., work until 11.00 a. m., not more than 30 minutes for dinner, and work from 11.30 a. m. to 3.30 p. m., Central Standard Time.

"Rule 8—Any man called from inside to perform outside day labor shall receive inside day wages.

"Rule 9—We adopt the check-off system as a part of the agreement of this district. This pertains to regular dues and assessments of the U. M. W. of A., but shall not give any right to collect fines unless such fines are ordered by two-thirds of the members of the local union. However, should either the operator, the local union or the party upon whom the fine is imposed. object to said fine, each of them shall have the right of appeal to the sub-district president for a final ruling.

"In order to be honored the check-off must be furnished to the company not later than 5 p. m., on the second and seventeenth day of each month.

"Rule 10—No strike shall take place at any mine under the jurisdiction of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6 (Ohio), except for violation of agreements, refusal of employers to pay on regular pay day without explanation, until the grievances at the mine affected have been thoroughly investigated by the officers of District 6, U. M. W. of A., and operators interested.

"Rule 11—That a uniform rate of one per cent on the dollar be charged in pick mines, where company hires the blacksmith, and it is further agreed that no charge be made for blacksmithing for cutters and loaders in machine mines.

"Rule 12—Bottom coal in all narrow work must be taken up and loaded by the loader.

"Where bottom coal not to exceed 4 inches in thickness is required to be taken up in wide rooms and said coal is in normal state and parts freely from the bottom, the miner must take it up without extra compensation.

"Where coal sticks to bottom and extra labor is required to lift same, the company shall pay loader extra at a rate per crossing based upon maximum inside day labor scale.

"A committee of two operators and two miners to investigate and determine the method of payment on basis named.

"This committee shall determine what constitutes a sticky bottom.

"If a machine cutter leaves a sprag or a thick bottom in excess of 4 inches he shall be notified to remove same, and should he refuse he shall be charged 50 c. for each sprag or bottom, the same to be paid to the loader.

"Rule 13—That all machine loaders be accorded two rooms for each two men, and the operators pledge themselves to provide two rooms for two men at the earliest possible moment, but in the event of territory becoming scarce through a squeeze or striking horseback, or any unavoidable obstacle, this shall not be construed so as to diminish the output of the mine.

"Rule 14—There shall be no free turns allowed for either rooms or entries. The entries shall be driven as fast as operators desire or conditions permit; but in no case shall entry miners be allowed more cars than room miners, and at least once each pay the turn shall be made uniform throughout the mine for the time previously worked. If, however, the regular turn will not allow cars enough to drive the entries as fast as desired, the operators shall increase the number of miners in each entry, so that by giving to each the regular turn, the entries shall be driven as fast as two miners could do with full work.

"If, however, the room men decline to take their place in the entries when requested to do so by the operator, then the entry man shall have free turns until the entries are driven their required length.

"Rule 15—Miners shall exercise proper care in posting the soapstone in rooms, in order to prevent falls. When coal is taken out by the person employed in a room and soapstone falls to the amount of 750 pounds, it shall be removed by the miner without compensation, and when the fall of soapstone exceeds 750 pounds the miner shall be paid for removing it, or the company remove the same.

"Rule 16—Checkweighmen may be placed on tipple at expense of miners, and his duties shall be those prescribed by the laws of the State of Ohio, and all weigh scales may be tested by the miners at any reasonable time.

"Rule 17—Members of the Pit Committee and local officers shall remain at their working places the same as all other employes, unless a miner and a mine boss fail to agree on prices to be paid for extra work when they may be called in to confer with the superintendent to decide the dispute. This, however, shall not prevent the committee from looking after the proper interest pertaining to the miners' organization.

"It is understood that mine committees have no authority to order a suspension of work except upon a vote of three-fourths of the members of the local union.

"Rule 18—All rooms shall be 24 feet wide or over. Machine rooms, when ordered by mine boss, driven less than 24 feet wide, entry price shall be paid.

"Rule 19—Where entries are ordered driven fifteen degrees or more away from the line of butts or face, 25 cents extra per yard shall be paid in pick and machines, but shall not be construed to apply to necessary curves in turning one entry from another, and in order to lay track on a required radius.

"Rule 20—Any rule, either local or general, governing the scale or conditions of employment in the Pittsburg vein of Sub-District No. 5, shall be mutually agreed to by the operators and miners interested, and said rules, before being enforced, shall receive the endorsement of the officials of the operators and officials of District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America.

"Rule 21—No meeting shall be held during working hours, except by mutual arrangement between miners and superintendent.

"Rule 22—On the day that death by accident to an employe occurs in the mine, for that day only, the miners may cease working, but under no circumstances shall the mine be made idle for any funeral. And in consideration of the mine continuing to work on a day a funeral is held, the operators agree to contribute to the bereaved family, on the death of any of their workmen, one-third the amount paid by the miners, said amount not to exceed $25.00. This does not prevent friends from attending the funeral.

Rule 23—When any employe absents himself from duty two days or more, except on account of sickness, without giving advance notice to the mine boss or mine superintendent, when possible, he forfeits his position.

"When a machine runner or any employe upon whose work other employes of the mine are dependent, absents himself from duty without giving advance notice, when possible, to the mine boss, he forfeits his position.

"Rule 24—When any places on any territory are not cut and the machine runners have not worked as many hours as the mine has worked, by reason of breakdowns, sickness or absence of runners, the machine runners shall work on idle days or overtime until they have made up the lost time.

"Rule 25—In case of local or general suspension of mining, either at the expiration of this contract or otherwise, the engineers, firemen, pumpers and other men necessary to keep mines in shape, shall not suspend work, but shall, when mine is suspended, fully protect and keep in repair all of the company's property under their care, and operate fans and pumps, and lower and hoist such men or supplies as may be required to keep up steam at the company's coal plant but it is understood and agreed that the operators will not ask them to hoist any coal produced by non-union labor for sale on the market. The rates to be paid for such work to be those in effect at the time of suspension, and then subject to any subsequent settlement.

"Rule 26—The conditions, employment, duties, hours of labor, and membership in the U. M. W. of A., of the engineers, firemen, electricians and machinists existing prior to September 1, 1903, continue and remain in force during the life of this contract.

"It is further agreed that any interference on the part of any member of the U. M. W. of A., of a mine committee, or local officer with the duties of engineer, fireman, electrician or machinist, shall subject such member or members of the U. M. W. of A., of a mine committee, or local officers to suspension or dismissal by the operator, with the understanding that the engineers, firemen, electricians, or machinists, who are now members, shall remain members of the U. M. W. of A., and those who are not members shall not be compelled to join.

"Rule 27—It is understood and agreed that should any dispute arise in regard to the interpretation of the rules and provisions of this scale that the interpretation shall be left entirely to the Committee of Operators and Miners who formulated and signed this agreement.

"Rule 28—Pay days shall be uniform on the 10th and 25th of each month.

In effect April 1, 1910, and ending March 31, 1912.

RULES AND REGULATIONS.

PICK MINING.

"Mining, per ton, screened coal.....$0.95
"Mining, run of mine coal, per ton..... .6785"

p. 3, l. 1–12.

(426) "GENERAL RULES FOR PICK AND MACHINE MINING.

"Rule 1. The screen adopted by the Toledo Interstate agreement of 1908 is reaffirmed and shall be uniform in size, six feet wide by 12 feet long, built of flat or Akron shaped bars of not less than five-eighths of an inch surface, with one and one-fourth inches between bars, free from obstruction; and such screen shall rest upon a sufficient number of bearings to hold the bars in proper position.

"Rule 2. That the eight-hour day of forty-eight hours of six days per week is hereby reaffirmed.

"Rule 3. That an eight-hour day means eight hours' work in the mine at usual working places for all classes of inside day labor. This shall be exclusive of the time required in reaching such working places in the morning and departing from same at night. Regarding drivers, they shall take their mules to and from the stables and the time required in so doing shall not include any part of the day's labor, their work beginning when they reach the change at which they receive empty cars, but in no case shall the driver's time be docked while he is waiting for such cars at the point named.

"Rule 4. That when the men go into the mine in the morning they shall be entitled to two hours' pay whether or not the mine works the full two hours. But after the first two hours the men shall be paid for every hour thereafter by the hour, for each hour's work or fraction part thereof. If for any reason the regular routine work cannot be furnished the inside labor for a portion of the first two hours, the operators may furnish other than the regular labor for the unexpired time.

"Rule 5. Mining entries and entry break-throughs in pick and machine mines drove double shifts, extra, per yard 29½ cents.

"Rule 6. Wet entry shall be paid 29½ cents per yard extra when it has been fully determined that it is entitled thereto by the miner and the mine boss, or by the mine committee and mine superintendent, in case the former do not agree.

"Rule 7. Operators shall take the water out of rooms and entries and have rooms and entries dry at starting time, or pay 4¾ cents per barrel if the miner has to bail it. Barrels to be placed in rooms and entries, and where barrels cannot be placed in entries, the water box shall be forwarded for the entrymen to bail water in.

"Rule 8. Prices to be paid for slate or soapstone coming down unavoidably over the coal shall be agreed upon by the mine boss and the miner, and if they fail to agree, it shall be referred to the superintendent, mine boss and mine committee.

"Rule 9. Clay veins and spars shall be paid for, the matter to be referred to miner affected and mine boss. If they fail to agree, the company reserves the right to remove the same and give the miner another place.

"Rule 10. Any rolls or horsebacks coming up in bottom or down in top, shall be paid for as follows, per yard, running with rolls:

Six to ten inches in thickness	$0.29½
Between ten and seventeen inches	.59
Between seventeen and twenty-three inches	.89
Between twenty-three and twenty-nine inches	1.18

"And rolls of more thickness shall be paid in the same proportion for each six inches.

"Miners shall take up and remove roll where same crosses roadway.

"When roll is so hard as to require drilling and blasting the operator shall furnish one-half and the miner one-half the labor for drilling and blasting.

"Rule 11. Work shall begin at 7 a. m., work to 11 a. m., not more than 30 minutes for dinner, and work from 11.30 a. m. to 3.30 p. m., Central Standard time.

"Rule 12. Any man called from inside to perform outside day labor shall receive inside day wages.

"Rule 13. We adopt the check-off system as a part of the agreement of this district. This pertains to regular dues and assessments of the U. M. W. of A., but shall not give any right to collect fines unless such fines are ordered by two thirds of the members of the local Union. However, should either the operator, the local union or the party upon whom the fine is imposed, object to said fine, each of them shall have the right of appeal to the sub-district president for a final ruling. In order to be honored the check-off must be furnished to the company not later than 5 p. m., on the second and seventeenth day of each month.

"Rule 14. No strike shall take place at any mine under the jurisdiction of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6 (Ohio) except for violation of agreements, or refusal of employers to pay on the regular pay day without explanation, until the grievances at the mine affected have been thoroughly investigated by the officers of District 6, U. M. W. of A., and operators interested.

"Rule 15. That a uniform rate of 1 per cent on the dollar be charged in pick mines where company hires the blacksmith, and it is further agreed that no charge be made for blacksmithing for cutters and loaders in machine mines.

"Rule 16. Machine men in both wide and narrow work are required to cut coal level and close to bottom, and in no case shall thickness of bottom exceed four inches. If a machine cutter leaves a sprag or a thick bottom in excess of four inches he shall be notified to remove same, and should he fail or refuse, he shall be charged 50 cents for each sprag, or 25 cents for each run, or both, the same to be paid to the loader.

"Bottom coal in all narrow work must be taken up and loaded by the loader. When the operator requires bottom coal not to exceed four inches in thickness, to be taken up in wide rooms and said coal is in normal state and parts freely from the bottom, the miner must take it up without extra compensation. Where coal sticks to the bottom and extra labor is required to lift same, the company shall pay loader extra at a rate per crossing based upon maximum inside day labor scale.

"Should the loader and the mine foreman fail to agree on the character of the bottom coal, or the compensation to which the loader is entitled, the matter shall be referred to the mine committee and superintendent. In case they disagree, the miner or miners affected shall be given an average place in the mine pending a final settlement of the question in dispute, then the matter shall be referred to the Sub-District President and the Operators' Commissioner, who shall use every effort to settle the controversy, and in case they disagree, then the Sub-District President may call in one experienced miner, and the commissioner, one operator or superintendent, and the matter referred to them and their decision shall be final and binding. Said investigations and decisions shall not be delayed, but be determined at the earliest possible date.

"Rule 17. That all machine loaders be accorded two rooms for each two men and the operators pledge themselves to provide two rooms for two men at the earliest possible moment, but in the event of territory becoming scarce through a squeeze or striking a horseback, or any unavoidable obstacle, this shall not be construed so as to diminish the output of the mine.

"Rule 18. There shall be no free turns allowed for either rooms or entries. The entries shall be driven as fast as operators desire or conditions permit; but in no case shall entry miners be allowed more cars than room miners and at least once each pay the turn shall be made uniform throughout the mine for the time previously worked. If, however, the regular turn will not allow cars enough to drive the entries as fast as desired, the operators shall increase the n mber of miners in each entry, so that, by giving to each the regular turn, the entries shall be driven as fast as two miners could do with full work.

"If, however, the room men decline to take their place in the entries when requested to do so by the operator, then the entry man shall have free turns until the entries are driven their required length.

"Rule 19. Miners shall exercise proper care in posting the soapstone in rooms, in order to prevent falls. When coal is taken out by the person employed in a room and soapstone falls to the amount of 750 pounds, it shall be removed by the miner without compensation, and when the fall of soapstone exceeds 750 pounds, the miner shall be paid for removing it, or the company remove the same.

"Rule 20. Checkweighmen may be placed on tipple at expense of miners, and his duty shall be that prescribed by the laws of the State of Ohio, and all weigh scales may be tested by the miners at any reasonable time.

"Rule 21. Members of the Pit Committee and local officers shall remain at their working places the same as all other employes unless a miner and a mine boss fail to agree on prices to be paid for extra work, when they may be called in to confer with the superintendent to decide the dispute. This, however, shall not prevent the committee from looking after the proper interest pertaining to the miners' organization.

"It is understood that mine committees have no authority to order a suspension of work except upon a vote of three-fourths of the members of the local union.

"Rule 22. All rooms shall be 24 feet wide or over. Machine rooms when ordered by the mine boss, driven less than 24 feet wide, entry price shall be paid.

"Rule 23. When entries are ordered driven 15 degrees or more away from the line of butts or face, 25 cents extra per yard shall be paid in pick and machine mines, but shall not be construed to apply to necessary curves in turning one entry from another, and in order to lay track on a required radius.

"Rule 24. Any rule, either local or general, governing the scale or conditions of employment in the Pittsburg Vein of Sub-District No. 5, shall be mutually agreed to by the operator and miners interested, and said rules before being enforced, shall receive the endorsement of the officials of the operators and officials of the District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America.

"Rule 25. No meeting shall be held during working hours, except by mutual agreement between miners and superintendent.

"Rule 26. On the day that death by accident to an employe occurs in the mine, for that day only, the miners may cease working, but under no circumstances shall the mine be made idle for any funeral. And in consideration of the mine continuing to work on a day a funeral is held, the operators agree to contribute to the bereaved family, on the death of any of their workmen, one third of the amount paid by the miners, said amount not to exceed $25.00. This does not prevent friends from attending a funeral.

"Rule 27. When any employe absents himself from duty two days or more, except on account of sickness, without giving advance notice to the mine boss or mine superintendent, when possible, he forfeits the position.

"When a machine runner or any employe upon whose work other employes of the mine are dependent, absents himself from duty without giving advance notice, when possible, to the mine boss, he forfeits his position.

"Rule 28. When any places or any territory are not cut and the machine runners have not worked as many hours as the mine has worked by reason of break-downs, sickness or absence of runners, the machine runners shall work on idle days or overtime until they have made up the lost time.

"Rule 29. In case of local or general suspension of mining, either at the expiration of this contract or otherwise, the engineers, firemen, pumpers, and other men necessary to keep the mines in shape shall not suspend work, but shall, when mine is suspended, fully protect and keep in repair all of the company's property under their care, and operate fans and pumps, and lower and hoist such men or supplies as may be required to keep up steam at the company's coal plant; but it is understood and agreed that the operators will not ask them to hoist any coal produced by non-union labor for sale on the market. The rates to be paid for such work to be those in effect at the time of suspension and then subject to any subsequent settlement.

"Rule 30. The conditions, employment, duties, hours of labor, and membership of the U. M. W. of A., of the engineers, firemen, electricians and machinists existing prior to September 1, 1903, continue and remain in force during the life of this contract.

"It is further agreed that any interference on the part of any member of the U. M. W. of A. of a mine committee, or local officer, with the duties of engineers, fireman, electrician or machinist shall subject such member or members of the U. M. W. of A., of a mine committee, or local officer to suspension or dismissal by the operator with the understanding that the engineers, firemen, electricians or machinists who are now members shall remain members of the U. M. W. of A., and those who are not members shall not be compelled to join.

"Rule 31. It is understood and agreed that should any dispute arise in regard to the interpretation of the Rules and Provisions of this scale that the interpretation shall be left entirely to the Committee of Operators and Miners who formulated and signed this agreement.

"Rule 32. Pay days shall be uniform on the 10th and 25th of each month.

"Rule 33. All draw-slate over twelve (12) inches in thickness shall be considered thick slate and shall be paid for at the following prices per yard, for the full width of and running with the working place:

When Thickness of Slate is	To be paid for	Price in Room 24 wide	Price in Entry 12 ft. wide	Price in Entries 8 ft. wide.

(a) "President Lewis' Report.

Submitted to the Twenty-Second Annual Convention of the International United Mine Workers of America.

"To the Officers and Representatives of the Twenty-second Annual Convention, United Mine Workers of America:

"Fellow Mine Workers: With the opening of this, the Twenty-Second Annual Convention of the United Mine Workers of America, we are reminded that another year has come and gone in the history of our movement. We are also reminded that just twenty-one years ago there assembled in the city of Columbus, Ohio, a small but determined body of miners. The miners' representatives to that convention were determined that no longer would personal animosities be permitted to jeopardize the interests and welfare of the men who toil in and around the coal mines. As a result of their deliberations, the United Mine Workers of America was organized and embarked on its mission of bringing into one organization all the mine workers of the country.

"Those of you who remember the history of the miners' unions for several years previous to 1890, will recall that rival organizations in the mining industry had divided our forces. The rivalry that existed at that time between the two miners' unions created bitter animosities among the members and destroyed the effectiveness of either organization, to accomplish any permanent good for the mine workers. The time and energy of the members of both organizations was spent fighting each other, instead of combining their forces to resist the unjust conditions imposed on the mine workers. Is it any wonder that many miners, as well as others, were skeptical of the success of the United Mine Workers' organization at the time it was organized on January 25, 1890?

"In the twenty-one years' existence of the United Mine Workers the good judgment of the founders of our union has been fully vindicated. Our hopes and expectations have not always been realized, but an impartial review of the history of our movement will convince any one of the splendid results accomplished by the organized mine workers of the country. It is true that the United Mine Workers of America has not always been successful. It has met with its reverses and defeats as well as won its victories. But its work has brought to the membership a steady increase in wages and a permanent improvement in the working conditions of the men who are employed in the mines. We have reason to congratulate ourselves that in the thoroughly and partly organized mining States we have nearly 350,000 men who are now employed under joint agreements that provide the highest rate of wages ever paid the mine workers of the country.

"When we last met in regular annual convention we were confronted with the work of outlining a plan to extend the interstate joint movement. We were expected to adopt a policy that would provide a higher wage standard to meet the increased cost of living.

"I have always been opposed to a division of our forces in negotiating our wage contracts either in districts or with individual operators. I am a firm believer in unity of action and this must be the basis of the future success of the organization. In harmony with my position on this question, I submitted to the representatives in the last annual convention the following general recommendation in the form of a resolution:

1. That we demand an advance in wages for each and every mining district of the country.

2. That all district officers are authorized and instructed to negotiate wage agreements, but no district shall sign a contract until all wage contracts are negotiated.

3. That all mines shall continue working after the 1st of April and continue working until wage contracts are finally negotiated, provided the present rates continue until final action is determined upon.

"In the recommendation that I submitted to the convention there were three essential features. One was to the effect that we were entitled to and should receive an advance in wages. The other was to give each scale district an opportunity to negotiate the terms of wage contracts in accord with the declared policy of the International convention, but denied the right of the representatives of any district or group of districts to sign an agreement until each and every scale district in the country had completed their negotiations. The third important feature in my recommendation was to avoid a suspension of operation of the mines, by continuing to work until all wage contracts were finally negotiated.

"I firmly believed at that time and have been thoroughly convinced since, that if the proposition I submitted to the last annual convention had been adopted we would have avoided the prolonged strikes of the past year, prevented the enormous expense and secured as good if not better terms in the wage contracts which were finally negotiated and agreed upon.

"What I desire to explain at this time is that the recommendations I submitted to the last annual International convention were in perfect harmony with the position I have taken for years; i. e., that we should keep our forces united at all times; that we should not have sectional strikes or settlements, and that all contracts should be negotiated before any contracts can be signed. To make this policy effective and avoid periodical strikes, either more time must be taken to negotiate wage contracts or the mines should continue working pending the negotiation of wage agreements.

NEGOTIATIONS OF AGREEMENTS.

"The policy of the last annual convention to govern the negotiations of wage contracts included the following general propositions:

"A demand for run-of-mine system. Ten cents per ton advance in the mining rate. A uniform rate of wages for all classes of inside and outside labor with time and a half for overtime, Sundays, and holidays. An eight-hour day from 'bank to bank' and Saturday half holiday. That the contract be made for two years. That local inequalities be referred to districts affected. To adjust the new powder controversy in the Pittsburg district. No limit to amount of deductions for the organization. That no district negotiate an agreement to reimburse the operators for legislation that added cost to the production of coal. That contracts be negotiated but not signed by any district until all contracts were negotiated. That the International convention should not adjourn to reconvene in Toledo, Ohio.

"Immediately upon the adjournment of the International convention the miners' representatives of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and western Pennsylvania went to Toledo, Ohio, to meet the operators in interstate joint convention which had been called to meet in that city.

"The interstate joint convention at Toledo, Ohio, was called to order and committees on credentials and rules of order were appointed. The credential committee disagreed, the miners' representatives insisted that the Illinois miners should be seated in the interstate joint convention with voice and vote. The operators objected to the seating of the Illinois miners' representatives in the absence of the Illinois operators. The interstate joint convention at Toledo failed to even effect a permanent organization on the single issue of seating the Illinois miners.

"My position in the Toledo joint convention was clearly defined to the operators and miners. As a firm believer in the interstate joint movement, I was unwilling to negotiate a wage contract for three states. This position was in harmony with my declarations time and again of uniting, instead of dividing our forces in an effort to extend the interstate joint movement.

"When we adjourned the convention at Toledo there was little or no prospect of negotiating wage contracts. Conferences were held in various districts but with no success. A conference was called to meet in Cincinnati, Ohio, February 23, and it was agreed to issue a call for a joint convention of the representatives of the miners and operators of Indiana, Ohio and western Pennsylvania to meet in joint convention in Cincinnati, Ohio, March 8, 1910. An invitation was also extended to the Illinois miners and operators to take part in the interstate convention but they were not present. On February 25 a call was issued for a special International convention of the United Mine Workers to meet in Cincinnati, Ohio, March 15, 1910, to take such action as necessary to protect the interests of the mine workers of the country.

"After several weeks' deliberation the interstate joint convention in Cincinnati adjourned without reaching an agreement. The special International convention at Cincinnati adopted as the basis upon which wage contracts could be negotiated the following proposition:

> 1. That the following is the terms on which agreements can be negotiated:
> That the agreement of the present year be continued for the scale year beginning April 1, 1910, and ending March 31, 1912, with the exception of the mining prices and day wages.
>
> That the price for mining be increased five (5) cents per ton on inch-and-a-quarter screen lump coal, pick mining in western Pennsylvania thin vein, the Hocking the basing district of Ohio, and both block and bituminous districts of Indiana; three cents per ton on mine-run coal pick mining in the bituminous district of Indiana.
> That the price for machine mines be increased (4) cents per ton on screen lump coal in western Pennsylvania, thin vein, in the Hocking, the basing district of Ohio; four (4) cents per ton on screen lump coal in the block and bituminous district of Indiana, and three (3) cents per ton on mine-run coal in the bituminous district of Indiana.
> This internal differences both as to prices and condition be referred for adjustment to the various districts affected, it being understood that in the adjustment of such differences there shall be no modification of the advance of wages provided for in the proposition.

The inside day wage scale shall be advanced 5.55 per cent with the conditions of the Columbus day wage scale agreement of 1898.

That all narrow, dead work and room turning and outside day labor shall be paid a proportionate advance with the pick mining rate.

2. That contracts may be negotiated and agreed upon by states, districts or groups of districts.

3. That where all the operators within one district fail to sign the terms of the proposed contract that the operators of any sub-district may agree upon the general terms of the contract.

4. That where the operators of an entire state, district or sub-district agree to pay the general advance demanded their mines may continue in operation pending the final negotiations and agreement upon the details of the wage contract in the state, district or sub-district affected.

5. That details not herein specified are referred to the International Executive Board with full power to act, except the Board is not empowered to modify in any respect the terms of the demand for an advance in wages as it applies to mining, day labor—inside and out—narrow and dead work.

6. All coal companies shall be required to sign the contract for all the mines that operate in one or more districts, unless permission is given district officials to do otherwise by the International Executive Board.

7. That in any district where new explosives are used the mines affected shall operate on a run-of-mine basis and the company shall furnish the miners with new explosives at the same relative cost as black powder.

"Immediately upon the adjournment of the Special International Convention at Cincinnati, Ohio, the following letter was sent to the presidents of the various districts where wage contracts expired on April 1, 1910:

Indianapolis, Ind., March 30, 1910.

Dear Sir and Brother—You will find inclosed a copy of the proposition adopted at the special convention at Cincinnati, yesterday evening.

You can see by this proposition that the first thing necessary to be done is to get the operators of your district together and have them agree to sign the general terms of the contract providing they want the mines to continue in operation after April 1.

According to the rules laid down by the special convention at Cincinnati, no contracts can be signed up by individual operators. This rule should be adhered to as well as the other rules embodied in the proposition adopted by the special convention.

In accordance with the policy of the United Mine Workers, any of the operators that desire to have pumpers and such other men employed as may be necessary to take care and protect the property, such men should be permitted to work providing they receive the advance in wages provided for in the enclosed proposition.

With the hope that you will be able to arrange a conference of the operators of the District immediately, I remain,

Yours very truly,

(Signed) T. L. Lewis, President, U. M. W. of A.

"This letter was sent to each of the district presidents where contracts expired in order that we would have some definite understanding in regard to negotiating contracts on the basis provided by the policy outlined at the Cincinnati Special Convention.

"On April 1 about 300,000 mine workers suspended work to enforce the demands of the Cincinnati convention."

(429) "IRWIN DISTRICT.

(b) "There has been a strike in progress in the Irwin district of Pennsylvania that has cost the International organization of the United Mine Workers $329,900 up to November 30. Inasmuch as that strike was ordered by officers of the Pittsburgh district without even consulting the International officers and without even organizing the men, I feel it my duty to give you the facts in regard to the situation in that field.

"I made the statement at the last annual convention that we had organizers in the Irwin district, in the Greensburg and other non-union sections of Pennsylvania, as well as in Maryland and West Virginia. In the early part of March I learned that President Feehan had sent district officers or organizers into the Irwin district, and on March 5 I wrote President Feehan the following letter:

Indianapolis, Ind., March 5, 1910.

Mr. Francis Feehan,
President, District 5, Pittsburg, Pa.

Dear Sir and Brother: You may not be aware that we have organizers in the coke regions and in the Irwin field and that both of those districts are outside of the jurisdiction of District 5.

I am writing to inquire if it is true that your board members, or any of them, are working in those fields. If they are, they are interfering with our arrangements and may serio isly interfere with our plans to try and organize those fields.

I am writing to suggest that you have your board members confine their efforts to the territory under the jurisdiction of District 5. There are many men in District 5 that need to be brought into the organization and they will find plenty to do.

Hoping to hear from you immediately on this sub ject, I remain,

Yours very truly,

(Signed) T. L. LEWIS,
President, U. M. W. of A.

"I received a communication from President Feehan, dated March 7, in which he stated that the district vice-president with interpreters had been authorized to go to Greensburg on Friday, March 4, and succeeded in establishing an organization with about four hundred miners.

On March 20, while in Cincinnati, I communicated with President Feehan and stated that the Irwin district and the Connellsville coke regions would be separate districts when organized, and called his attention to the fact that a serious mistake had been committed in organizing a few men and declaring a strike in a district outside of the Pittsburg district. I received a letter from President Feehan, dated March 11, in which he stated that there was a necessity for a strike in the Irwin field, in order that the mine workers of that section could be given an opportunity to improve their working conditions. He also stated that he had made his position plain to the miners in the Irwin district, and that he did not think they expected to get any financial assistance from the International organization, and he stated that the Pittsburg District was willing to give the Irwin field men financial assistance.

"In reply to his communication, dated March 11, I sent him the following letter:

Burnett House,
Cincinnati, Ohio, March 14, 1910.

Mr. Francis Feehan, Cincinnati, Ohio:

Dear Sir and Brother: Desire to acknowledge receipt of your communication of March 11. I have read your letter very carefully and desire to state again that the Irwin district is not under the jurisdiction of District 5 and never was. It is District 3 if it was organized and the Connellsville coke regions is District 4. I am surprised that you did not know, according to your letter, that the Irwin field was no part of your district.

Any attempts to organize one mine in the Irwin field will simply jeopardize the possibility of organizing the entire district. When the International Executive Board has decided on a definite policy in regard to the situation in the Irwin field, those men will not be required to fight their battles alone.

Thanking you for the information contained in your letter, I remain,

Yours very truly,

(Signed) T. L. LEWIS,
President U. M. W. of A.

"On May 17, 1910, while the International Executive Board was in session at Indianapolis, an appeal from the secretary of the Pittsburg district was read. This appeal contained the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, We recognize that it is the duty of our organization to get every man who works in and around the mines to become a member of the U. M. W. of A., and

Whereas, We know that we owe it to ourselves and to our fellow workmen in the Greensburg and Irwin fields to do all in our power to bring them within the folds of our union, not only for their protection but our own; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the delegates to the Twenty-first Annual Convention of District No. 5, pledge our hearty cooperation and support to the striking miners in that field, and be it further

Resolved, That when the miners in the Pittsburg district resume operation that the district executive board be authorized to levy an assessment of twenty-five (25) cents per week on the membership in order to carry this strike to a successful termination, and be it further

Resolved, That we appeal to the International Executive Board to donate fifty thousand ($50,000.00) dollars to these people in order to promote the strike and extend the jurisdiction of the United Mine Workers of America, and be it further

Resolved, That the district officials appeal to officers and members of all district organizations affiliated with the U. M. W. of A. and all other trade organizations, if necessary, and urge them to send financial assistance to succeed in permanently establishing an organization and negotiating a wage scale in that field.

"In March, President Feehan expressed the opinion in his letter to me that he did not think the Irwin district mine workers expected any relief, and yet the resolutions adopted by the Pittsburg district convention requested the International Executive Board to donate fifty thousand dollars to support the men on strike in the Irwin district, and this at a time when we had over one hundred thousand members on strike through a failure to negotiate wage contracts.

"In keeping with the well-established custom and rules of the International Executive Board to investigate the merits of every appeal for financial assistance before it is endorsed, a committee of five International Board members, composed of Vice-President Hayes, Board Members Dagger, Haggerty, Powell and Smith was appointed to visit the Irwin district and learn the facts in regard to the existing conditions. The committee returned and failed to agree upon the kind of a report that should be submitted to the International Executive Board, but the majority of the committee of five recommended that the Irwin district strike be granted the moral and financial support of the International Executive Board.

"The recommendations of the majority of the committee of International Executive Board members appointed to go to the Irwin district was adopted.

"During the afternoon session of the International Executive Board, May 23, a motion was adopted to appoint a committee of five International Board members to draft a plan with reference to the Irwin strike. On May 28 the committee submitted to the International Executive Board a report that provided for the calling of a convention in the Irwin district for the purpose of forming a scale. That three International Executive Board Members, including the International Board member from District

5, be appointed to attend the convention. That the International and district officials co-operate to the fullest extent in conducting the strike and negotiating a settlement. That in the event of a conflict of authority the International Executive Board be recognized as the higher authority. That the financial relief donated by the International organization be handled through the district office. That the district secretary-treasurer furnish a statement to the International Secretary-Treasurer of the money expended. These recommendations were adopted.

"At a meeting of the International Executive Board held Friday evening, July 22, 1910, there appeared before the Board a committee representing eleven local unions in the Irwin district and presented a petition in which the International Executive Board was requested to form a district with a complete set of officers in the Irwin field, to issue orders to the engineers, firemen and other outside labor to quit work and to furnish more finance for the strike.

"The reason assigned by the committee representing the eleven local unions in the Irwin district for wanting a district formed immediately was to effect a settlement of the strike. It was stated by the committee from the Irwin district that the operators were unwilling to agree to any settlement with the officers of the Pittsburg district.

"The situation in the Irwin field was discussed from every possible phase and the following resolutions were offered and unanimously adopted:

> That a committee of three be appointed to co-operate with the officers of District 5 and the representatives of the strike district, with a view of trying to bring about a settlement of the strike in that field.
> That the forming of the district in the Irwin field be left in abeyance until we get a report from the committee provided for.

That the question of furnishing more money to that district be left in the hands of the resident officers.

"The reason that the International Executive Board was unwilling to form the new district immediately was that it would be additional expense to pay the district officers, as there was no per capita tax reported from any of the local unions in the Irwin district.

"In reporting the situation in the Irwin district, I have brought to your attention the fact that the mine workers of the Irwin district were involved in a strike before they were organized. The strike was declared without any preparation. It was inaugurated by the officers of the Pittsburg district without consulting the International Officers. The International organization has furnished financial assistance to the extent of $329,900 up to November 30, 1910, and since November 30, $20,000 per week has been sent. The International organization has had representatives in the Irwin district for months, not in full authority, but co-operating with the officers of the Pittsburg district and the representatives of the Irwin district to make the strike a success.

"That the Irwin district mine workers should be organized is a well-known fact; that they could have been organized without a strike is my firm belief; that the Irwin district miners made a splendid effort to win the strike after it was declared is well known to every person who is conversant with the situation. That the strike has not been a success in establishing the organization and wage contracts is due to the following reasons:

"1. The calling of a meeting of the men at one mine and declaring a strike without the men being organized.

"2. The failure to make proper preparation by organizing local unions and then calling a convention to formulate demands to be presented to the operators of the Irwin district.

"3. The failure to formulate demands to present to the operators of the Irwin district before a strike was declared.

"4. The failure of the officers of the Pittsburg district to consult the representatives of the International organization until a large number of unorganized men were on strike and in need of financial support.

"I have but briefly stated the many incidents that have taken place in connection with the Irwin district strike. I have been severely criticised by the officers of the Pittsburg district and others because I have tried to defend, in my own way, the interests of the miners. I have been made the subject of the most scurrilous abuse and I have remained silent and refused to be drawn into controversies over the Irwin strike situation. I remained silent but gave every possible assistance that the International could give in order that the miners of the Irwin district might win in their heroic struggle for justice.

"It may be a matter of information to you and for the the mine workers of the country to learn that I assisted in bringing a representative of one of the large companies in the Irwin district and President Feehan together to negotiate a settlement. In my judgment, if he had acted promptly, one thousand of the Irwin district miners would have returned to work under union wages and conditions last June. I believe that other settlements could have been effected if an agreement had been promptly made with the company mentioned. Later, I offered again to try and effect a settlement, but could not get President Feehan to agree upon any definite basis. He insisted that there should be a conference and then consider the basis of settlement.

"The Irwin district strike is still being conducted by the officers of the Pittsburg district and representatives of the International organization and the Irwin district. The production of coal in that district has reached that point where there is no hope of winning the strike under the present circumstances. The International organization is furnishing relief to support the men on strike to the extent of $20,000 per week. I have no desire and I have no right to deceive you in regard to the situation in any district. It is my duty to tell you frankly that it is a waste of money to continue the Irwin district strike under the present circumstances. In my opinion the strike in the Irwin district will be completely lost if continued under the present method of conducting that strike. The International organization is furnishing the financial support and should have complete control to perfect the interest of the miners now idle.

"Those men have been misled and deceived long enough and the International organization has contributed to their support without authority to settle the strike. Let me call your attention to a remarkable fact. It was stated to me by President Feehan in the early part of last year that a local was organized at Greensburg, Pa., March 4, and yet, according to the books at the International Office, not one cent of per capita tax or assessments have been paid by the miners of the Irwin district to the International organization."

(430) "COST OF STRIKES.

(c) "The United Mine Workers has passed through several criticial periods in its history.

"In the year 1894, with less than 20,000 members, the organization engaged in a contest of a national character.

"The outcome of that contest was a compromise and the leaders of that strike were severely criticized by those of our members who did not understand the conditions of the mining industry at that time. In the year 1897, as a result of internal strife and dissension, the organization had less than 10,000 members. Wages had reached a point where the mine workers of the country were in a condition of starvation. Desperation itself compelled the miners to engage in a national strike, and without any financial means of support the strike was declared on July 4 and brought to an end in September with a compromise on wages and an agreement to re-establish the interstate joint movement. The interstate joint convention in January, 1898, gave to the mine workers of the country an eight-hour day without a strike.

"In the year 1904, in order to avoid a national strike, the mine workers of the competitive field accepted a reduction in wages and there was very little criticism of the leaders who were directing the affairs of the organization at that time. In the year 1906 the organization was again confronted with a criticial situation and after a struggle the wage scale of 1903 was restored, but many important conditions were sacrificed that year in a number of the States, including Illinois, Ohio and the Southwest. In the year 1908, in the midst of an industrial depression that affected the entire country, the United Mine Workers was able to maintain its standard of wages and partially re-establish the interstate joint movement that had been disrupted in 1906. Last year we were convinced that we were entitled to an advance in wages and, failing to negotiate wage contracts previous to the expiration of our agreements, about 300,000 mine workers suspended work on April, 1910. Our efforts last year might have been more successful and less costly if we had avoided sectional strikes and sectional settlements.

"I have referred to those periods in the history of our movement in order that you and our members might take greater interest in the success of the organization. If you will carefully study the history of the United Mine Workers, I believe you will be convinced that strikes have not brought the greatest measure of success to our organization.

"Sectional strikes of any magnitude have been a complete failure in promoting the welfare of the United Mine Workers of America. This fact emphasizes again the necessity of changing our policy and adopting new methods that will be more effective in protecting our rights.

"I have prepared a statement, covering a period of eleven years, in which is given the amount of money paid to each district in support of mine workers who have been on strike. The period begins with 1900 and ends with the year 1910.

AMOUNT PAID TO EACH DISTRICT FOR STRIKE RELIEF.

District 1, Anthracite	$705,830.94
District 2, Central Pennsylvania	497,987.48
District 3, Irwin Field	329,900.00
District 5, Western Pennsylvania	44,016.07
District 6, Ohio	216,566.13
District 7, Anthracite	261,500.00
District 8, Indiana Block	500.00
District 9, Anthracite	501,100.00
District 10, Washington	59,500.00
District 12, Illinois	74,250.00
District 14, Kansas	122,500.00
District 15, Colorado	707,676.45

District 16, Maryland and Meyersdale	421,335.21
District 17, West Virginia	669,938.81
District 18, British Columbia	49,800.18
District 19, Tennessee	461,306.01
District 20, Alabama	1,286,031.32
District 21, Arkansas and Oklahoma	293,061.00
District 22, Wyoming	3,439.30
District 23, Kentucky	312,222.26
District 24, Michigan	7,700.00
District 25, Missouri	95,000.00
District 26, Nova Scotia	968,775.00
Total	$8,089,986.16

"In addition to the foregoing information I have also prepared another financial statement giving the amount that has been paid each year to support mine workers on strike for the same period beginning with the year 1900 and ending with the year 1910:

AMOUNT PAID OUT ANNUALLY IN SUPPORT OF STRIKES.

Year 1900	$144,462.50
Year 1901	202,202.71
Year 1902	1,834,506.53
Year 1903	301,922.44
Year 1904	1,065,435.47
Year 1905	753,626.02
Year 1906	805,599.92
Year 1907	105,045.57
Year 1908	744,897.19
Year 1909	600,267.39
Year 1910	1,532,020.42
Total	$8,089,986.16

"To the eight million dollars spent by the International organization must be added the hundreds of thousands of dollars contributed by our members to the districts and spent for the same purpose. If you will examine these two statements you will discover that where we have spent the most money, in support of strikes, is where we have the least membership.

"This information should be conclusive evidence that the strike as a method of organizing has not proven a success. I am convinced that sectional strikes will not organize the non-union mining districts of our country.

"The enormous expenditure of money and the tremendous waste of energy incident to a strike should be avoided. Our right to strike must never be surrendered, but as the strike is an industrial war measure it should be the last method resorted to in our effort to enforce any demands that we present to the mine owners.

(431) "MEMBERSHIP.

(d) "Herewith is given a table showing the average paid-up membership for each year since the formation of the United Mine Workers of America in 1890:

Year.	Members.	Year.	Members.	Year.	Members.
1890	20,912	1897	39,731	1904	251,006
1891	17,044	1898	32,902	1905	264,950
1892	19,376	1899	61,887	1906	230,667
1893	14,244	1900	115,321	1907	260,740
1894	17,628	1901	198,024	1908	252,018
1895	10,871	1902	175,367	1909	265,274
1896	9,617	1903	247,240	1910	231,392

"It is a matter of congratulation to our membership that we are able to report that we received per capita tax at the International Office on an average of 231,392 members for each month for the year ending November 30, 1910. This is especially significant when we pause to consider the large number of mine workers who were on strike and who, according to our laws, are not required to pay monthly dues.

"In the month of March, 1910, per capita tax was received from 310,744 members, the highest number in the history of the organization. That the strike affected our paying membership you can readily understand, when I call your attention to the fact that in May, 1910, we received per capita tax on but 118,811 members.

"As a further evidence that the United Mine Workers of America has lost none of its prestige, we received per capita tax at the International office in December, 1910, on 308,660 members. This is the highest number of members upon which per capita tax has been reported for any December month in the history of the organization. In my opinion we ought to be proud of this remarkable showing on the part of our members, in view of the prolonged strikes and the extra assessment of $1.00 per month that has been levied on our membership since May of last year. You know that heavy assessments have a tendency to cause a falling off in our membership.

"If the enemies of the United Mine Workers can derive any consolation from this statement of the actual condition of our union we have no objection. Let me here suggest that if these results can be secured and maintained by the organization when we have members who are doing all they can to create friction and divide our forces, what could we do if every member of the United Mine Workers was actually lending his assistance to make the organization a greater power for good. Let us try and work for the success of the United Mine Workers' Union and the welfare of the people we represent."

(432) "UNORGANIZED MINING DISTRICTS.

(e) "The all important problem confronting the United Mine Workers of America is, how can we organize the mine workers in the non-union districts and complete the work in those districts which are but partly organized? Costly and unsuccessful efforts have been made to organize the non-union districts through the medium of strikes.

"The tremendous expenditure of the funds of the organization and the failure to organize the States of the Ohio river as well as Colorado, Maryland and a large section of Pennsylvania, should prompt us to investigate the cause of the hostile attitude and the bitterness shown toward the organization by many of the operators in the States named.

"I have called attention in former reports to the fact that in West Virginia and other southern coal producing States, there is a firm conviction in the minds of a number of the operators that it is our purpose to organize the miners of those States in order to shut them out of the markets into which operators of organized districts ship coal. This is an unfortunate condition but is partly due to the action of a few of our own members in misrepresenting the facts and deceiving our members.

"During the past year I assigned International Vice-President Hayes and Board Members Farrington, Watkins and Garner to visit the Norfolk and Western district and the Fairmont region of West Virginia to investigate and report the prospects of organizing that State. The reports submitted to me verified what I have known for years—that in certain non-union districts, an organizer jeopardized his own life the instant he undertook to organize the miners.

"My experience in West Virginia and other non-union mining States prompts me to believe that we should clearly define our position with reference to those States. We should declare in the most emphatic manner that it is not our purpose to organize the non-union mining districts to curtail their coal production. We should emphasize our position that every non-union mining district of the country is entitled to an equal opportunity with every other mining district to market the product of their mines.

"Let us clearly define our position as organized mine workers. Let us then appeal to the intelligence of the operator and the miner in the non-union districts. If we desire to establish that confidence necessary to our success we should be perfectly frank in stating our position and we must be absolutely sincere in carrying into effect our declarations.

"I have stated in former conventions, and I repeat again, that the application of common sense should be the basis of a new method of extending our organization into the non-union mining districts and to establish permanent industrial peace between the mine owners and the mine workers of the country.

(433) "JOINT WAGE AGREEMENTS.

(f) "The joint conference method adopted by the operators and miners for the purpose of negotiating wage contracts has done much to establish peace in the mining industry. Whether this method is to be continued will depend entirely upon the sincerity of those who have been parties to the joint movement.

"Time and again we have declared in our conventions that differences existing between the employer and employe in the mining industry should be settled without resorting to strikes. In recent years there has been a disposition among our members to ignore the terms of the contracts under which they are employed, and to refuse to accept or be governed by the advice of their official representatives. If this condition is allowed to continue, and if there is no way by which our members can be convinced that agreements should be respected and complied with, then the joint movement will necessarily pass out of existence.

"In a number of districts there are so many rules being incorporated in our joint agreements that it is difficult for our members to understand the meaning and the application of the terms of the contract. Those rules are no doubt insisted upon by the operators in order to avoid strikes. There is so much delay in settling even trifling disputes, owing to technicalities in the rules, that our members become restless and finally become desperate at the failure of having grievances adjusted. The result is that instead of strikes being prevented, the mines are stopped in violation of the expressed terms of the agreement.

"Simplicity should be the basis of our joint agreements. A contract should be so clear and specific that there would be no trouble for any member to understand what it means. Penalties for failure to comply with the terms of wage agreements and incorporated in our contracts, should apply to the mine foreman and superintendent as well as to the miner and mine laborer.

"What are known as stampede strikes, locally or otherwise, are becoming a serious menace to the permanency of the joint movement method of arranging wage contracts. There is no excuse that should justify a suspension of the operation of the mines, especially under a contract mutually agreed to by the operators' and miners' representatives. That strikes take place at mines where a contract is in effect proves either that there is a defect in the contract itself, or that the parties to the contract were not sincere when it was negotiated.

"If we are to give stability to the joint movement we must adopt some practical method, not only to negotiate wage contracts, but to have them strictly complied with in every respect.

"The existence of the joint movement and the future well-being of the mine workers of the country depends upon what action this convention may take to restore that confidence necessary for the success of the United Mine Workers and the joint movement method of negotiating wage agreements."

(434) "RIGHT TO ORGANIZE.

(g) "In my report to the last annual convention I expressed my opinion in regard to the right of the laboring people to organize. This is a subject of such vital importance to the wage earners of the country that I deem it my duty to again emphasize the importance of insisting upon our right to organize the mine workers in every State in the Union.

"The power of co-operation and the dependency of individuals upon each other in every walk of life, we are compelled to more fully realize every day of our existence. Regardless of the tremendous impulse given to each movement through unity of purpose, there are employers of labor, and even representatives of the government, who deny that unity of action among laboring people, that they, themselves, exercise in their every day affairs.

"The employers of labor and those representatives of the government who attempt to prevent the laboring men from organizing and seek to destroy labor unions are hastening the day when the laboring people of this country will assert themselves and by the intelligent use of the franchise will take complete charge of every branch of the United States government.

"The time has come when we must bring forcibly but intelligently to the attention of the enemies of organized labor that in an era of concerted effort there is no such a thing as individual liberty. We must convince those who are attempting to destroy the labor movement that we will not be denied the right to co-operate with each other to better our condition and secure for ourselves a brighter future.

"Capital has a right to be invested through human agencies, either in dollars singly or in combination with millions of other dollars. The wage earner must be conceded the right to act singly or in conjunction with all of his fellow laborers. This is not a sentimental expression but a statement of a condition that will eventually be recognized by the nation and respected by the employers of labor, as well as men in public life. Capital and labor should co-operate and work together where it is possible for such a condition to exist. There can be no industrial peace and there can be no permanent progress for the nation where men are compelled to be subordinate to the influence of wealth."

(435) "WHY WE ORGANIZE.

(h) "The status of the miners' organization must be explained by its representatives, not from a charitable or a sympathetic standpoint. We must make it clear to the American people, and especially to the enemies of our movement, that we have our existence legally and morally as a matter of absolute right, not only the right to organize but the right to accomplish the purpose for which we are united.

"Few men today, even among the rankest enemies of labor unions, would hesitate to publicly express the opinion that the wage earners of our country have no right to form themselves into labor unions. There is a further right, the right to make the organization effective in accomplishing the purpose for which we organize or else the existence of the union is a farce.

"It is well known that as mine workers we are organized to secure fair wages, better conditions of employment, shorter hours of labor and the enactment of such laws as will provide greater safeguards and lessen the danger in the mine. In addition to this we are seeking to educate ourselves and those depending upon us. In fact, the basic principle of our movement is to make better citizens of the men who work in and around the coal mines of the country.

"When we present our claims to certain employers or mine owners we are told that we must respect individual liberty, or the right of the mine owner to do what he pleases with his own. This may sound plausible and might be considered as reasonable if every individual were permitted to do as he pleased. What we insist upon is that if our labor is needed to develop the mining industry we have a right as an individual or collectively to dictate the terms upon which we will sell our labor.

"It is unfortunate but true that there are a number of employers and men in public life who seem to forget that rights, duties and obligations are mutual. They seem to forget that every man who has become a part of the government has made a concession and surrendered certain individual rights. They seem to forget that the producers of the wealth of the country make it possible for the nation and the government to exist.

"As members of the United Mine Workers' organization we are asking for no special privilege. All we ask for is an equal opportunity before the law, and this we have a right to insist upon. Those employers of labor and those representatives of the United States government who are attempting to destroy labor unions should remember that, when driven too far, the mighty army of labor, by organized effort and the intelligent use of the ballot, can remove from public office the enemies of the people, and can destroy the power of the coprorations and make them harmless as a factor to enslave the wealth producers of our country."

(436) "SHERMAN ANTI-TRUST LAW.

(i) "We have in this country a law known as the Sherman anti-trust law. Its alleged object is to destroy trusts and to prohibit combinations that are inimical to the interest of the people.

"We have no knowledge that the great industrial corporations have been limited in their authority to control certain commodities. There is no likelihood that the Standard Oil Company, the United States Steel Corporation and other great industrial institutions will be dissolved by the enforcement of the provisions of the Sherman anti-trust law.

"This law, like others enacted for the alleged purpose of protecting the rights of the people, is in reality being used to deprive the wage earners of the right to organize. We know that the Sherman anti-trust law, as well as many similar State laws, are being used to keep the mining industry from being elevated to a higher standard.

"In my opinion the Sherman anti-trust law and every other law of a similar character, should be either amended or repealed, and instead of attempting to regulate corporations and trusts in the manner provided by the Sherman law, the national and State governments should enact laws providing for a method of taxation that would remove any incentive for large corporations to accumulate wealth by illegitimate methods.

"As laboring men, and especially as mine workers, we should lend every influence we possess to repeal those provisions of the Sherman law that deprive us of our right to organize and establish the object for which we are united. Now is the time to act as we may at any time be made the victims of a law that was enacted to control trusts but which is being diverted to destroy organized labor."

(437) "WESTERN FEDERATION OF MINERS.

(j) "Our last Annual Convention clearly defined the attitude of the United Mine Workers of America toward our fellow workers who are members of the Western Federation of Miners.

"By a unanimous vote of our last International Convention we adopted the following:

1. We recommend that at some time in the future there shall be a complete solidification of the organized forces now enlisted under the names of Western Federation of Miners and the United Mine Workers of America.

2. That we declare in favor of continuing the present agreement of a mutual exchange of transfer cards.

3. We favor co-operation of the organizers of the two unions in organizing the non-union coal miners and metal miners in every section of the American continent.

4. We recommend to the Western Federation of Miners that they make application for affiliation with the American Federation of Labor, on condition that the present jurisdiction of the Western Federation of Miners and United Mine Workers will be recognized by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor.

5. We declare in favor of forming a mining department under the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labor to control the mining industry of the American continent, along similar lines to those departments which are now organized under the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labor.

6. In the event that this general outline is ratified by representatives of the United Mine Workers of America and the Western Federation of Miners, either in convention or by a referendum vote, all details to bring about a better working alliance to be referred to the International Executive Boards of the Western Federation of Miners and the United Mine Workers of America.

7. That whatever agreement this joint committee may reach is tentative and not binding on either organization, but subject to the action of each organization, either of whom has the right to accept, reject or modify this proposition, and nothing shall be binding on either organization, unless ratified by both.

"This general proposition was ratified by the members of the Western Federation of Miners. Representatives of the United Mine Workers of America and representatives of the Western Federation of Miners met in Washington, D. C., with the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor to arrange the granting of a charter. A conference of representatives of the United Mine Workers and the Western Federation of Miners together with representatives of the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, held another conference in Indianapolis to agree upon the granting of a charter to the Western Federation of Miners, but without success.

"The United Mine Workers' delegation to the Convention of the American Federation of Labor at St. Louis introduced the following resolution:

> Whereas, The Western Federation of Miners have applied for a charter of affiliation to the American Federation of Labor, with similar jurisdiction to be accorded to them that is now accorded to the United Mine Workers of America.
> Whereas, We believe that the Western Federation of Miners should be affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and accorded the same rights and privileges as the United Mine Workers of America in their jurisdiction of men working in and around the mines, to be organized under the Western Federation of Miners.

> Resolved, That it is the sense of the delegates representing the Thirtieth Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor that the Western Federation of Miners should be granted a charter of affiliation, with jurisdiction of employes working in and around the metalliferous mines under their present organization and that the officers and Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor are hereby instructed to issue to the Western Federation of Miners a charter of affiliation with the American Federation of Labor on that basis. On behalf of the United Mine Workers of America.

"The resolution, together with the report of the Executive Council, was referred to a special committee which reported to the Convention of the American Federation of Labor, recommending that a charter be granted to the Western Federation of Miners with a limited jurisdiction.

"It is to be regretted that, owing to technical objections of representatives who believe strictly in the trade idea of labor unions, a charter of affiliation with the American Federation of Labor was not granted to the Western Federation of Miners.

"I am still of the opinion that a charter should be granted to the Western Federation of Miners, giving to them similar jurisdiction over the men working in and around the metalliferous mines as has been conceded to the United Mine Workers of America. We should renew our efforts and determination to do everything within our power to secure a charter for the Western Federation of Miners. We should form a closer alliance in order that all the mine workers on the American Continent may finally be enrolled in one Union, fighting in a common cause for the industrial emancipation of the mine workers of the world."

RESOLUTION NO. 8 OF 1907 CONVENTION OF SUB-DISTRICT NO. 5 OF DISTRICT NO. 6, U. M. W. OF A. 33–49

Text of 33

The immediate moving cause for the adoption of this resolution is found in the report of the Secretary-Treasurer, Lee Rankin, one of the defendants, in his report to that Sub-District Convention 33

Hitchman mine was one of those intended to be organized under this resolution 34

The Glendale mine and the Richland mine were also intended to be organized under this resolution ... 34

These defendants made efforts to induce the Hitchman Company to agree to again run a union mine after it started up non-union June 12, 1906, and before their organizer, Hughes, appeared at the plant in the fall of 1907 34

Some of the defendants who, before the organizer, Hughes, appeared, tried to induce the Hitchman Company to reunionize, subsequently appeared to assist Hughes in his work—thus connecting them up with Hughes in the entire scheme 34

The efforts of organizer Hughes were successful 34, 35

If unionized, West Virginia operators would have to go with their relatively small representation into joint conventions between union operators, their competitors, and the United Mine Workers, to regulate conditions and prices, and would come home having conditions and prices imposed upon them which, taking into consideration the heavy differentials in railroad hauls, would practically put them out of business and close every mine in the State 35, 36

How the Union can carry out the contract it made by the Chicago Agreement to substantially restrain or suppress coal mining in West Virginia.

PAGES.

This brings us squarely to an examination of its constitution, manual, obligations, by-laws, and rules, by which, according to the English decisions, the legality or illegality of such organizations is to be determined 36–48

The Hitchman mine unionized April 1, 1903, under a threat from defendants that, unless unionized, defendants would shut down the Mt. Pleasant mine in Ohio then owned by the same persons who owned the Hitchman mine 48

The loss of the Hitchman Company 49

Efforts were made by defendants to unionize Hitchman mine after the restraining order of October 24, 1907, was granted 49

Efforts to unionize the Hitchman mine would still be made if the injunction forbidding it were out of the way 49

DECISION OF DISTRICT COURT IN HITCHMAN CASE 49–51

DECISION OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS. 51

SPECIFICATION OF ERRORS IN THE DECREE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS 52

ARGUMENT 52–77

THE PLAINTIFF'S CONTENTION IN THIS CASE BEFORE THIS COURT IS STATED UNDER THREE HEADS ... 52–54

First.—Chicago Agreement of 1898 is unlawful and the efforts of defendants to carry it out are also unlawful 52, 53

Second.—The United Mine Workers are an oppressive monopoly and seek absolute control of all labor in the coal mining industry 53

This particular organization is unlawful 60

PAGES.

Third.—If the effort of the United Mine Workers to get all men working in and about each mine to join their Union is lawful, still they may not exercise that right in such a way as will be inconsistent with, or as will destroy the constitutional right, of equal dignity, of the employer, and in this case the right of the Hitchman Company, to contract with its employees upon such terms as may be agreed upon between it and its employees. Neither may they make use of their right to organize in such a manner as will be inconsistent with, or as will interfere with or destroy such contracts between the employer and employee, and in this case between the Hitchman Company and its employees, with which contracts the defendants have no concern 53 54

ERRORS IN THE DECREE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS 54–77

First Error.—In holding the organization to be a lawful one 54–64

Reasons why that organization is unlawful 55–59

(a) Proved purposes and practices of the Union . . 55–59

(b) The test of the lawfulness of a voluntary organization, under the common law, and under the law of West Virginia, is to ascertain 60

(1) Whether any of the rules of the organization are unlawful in character 60

(2) If there are any unlawful ones, then whether the unlawful ones dominate the actions and purposes of the organization 60

(3) Or, whether the purposes contemplated by the unlawful ones are so intermingled with those designated by the lawful ones as to render separation impracticable 60

(c) If such domination of the unlawful prevails, or such separation cannot be made, then, under the law, the organization becomes unlawful 60

(d) Labor unions may be unlawful 60–64

PAGES.

Second Error.—In holding the Chicago Agreement of 1898 to be a lawful one 64, 65

Third Error.—In ignoring Resolution No. 8 and the unlawful acts done in an attempt to carry it into effect 66, 67

Fourth Error.—In holding that plaintiff has not a right to protect itself against the United Mine Workers by refusing to employ or to keep in its employ any member of that Union 67–69

Fifth Error.—In holding that the injunction in the Hitchman case restrains the laboring people from organizing their forces. The injunction in the Hitchman case does not restrain the laboring people from organizing their forces, but simply requires them in so doing to conform to the laws of the land as others are required to do 69–72

Sixth Error.—In holding that defendants may induce breaches of the contracts plaintiff has with its employees not to join that Union while they are employed by plaintiff 72–77

And in holding—

(a) That employment at the will of the parties makes it employment at the will of others 74, 75

(b) That the United Mine Workers may interfere with those contracts because the employment is at will 74, 75

And in failing to hold that—

(c) Defendants are not justified in their efforts to breach these contracts between plaintiff and its employees, as to which they have no duty, and with which they have no lawful concern 75–77

BRIEF OF GEORGE R. E. GILCHRIST AND HANNIS TAYLOR FOR THE HITCHMAN COAL AND COKE COMPANY, APPELLANT AND PETITIONER.

The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is reported in 131 C. C. A. 425, and 214 Federal 685.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

THE PLAINTIFF.

Is a West Virginia corporation operating a coal mine at Benwood, West Virginia, near Wheeling.

Record, p. 249, l. 45–49.

Its Mine.

When and Why Opened. 1902.

(a) Primarily, to supply coal to the B. & O. R. R. engines at its yards at Benwood, West Virginia, four miles below Wheeling, for which trade a contract was made before the mine was opened. Such coal is termed "Engine Coal."

(b) Secondarily, to ship coal to the general markets, local and otherwise, as its production became great enough in the course of its development to admit of that trade. Such coal is termed "Commercial Coal."

Record, p. 248, l. 20–43.
Record, pp. 249, 250, l. 1–6.

Its Trade.

About half engine and half commercial.

Record, p. 253, l. 26–34.

Engine Coal.

Engine coal must be mined and delivered with regularity and without the shut-downs that are incident to strikes.

Record, p. 282, l. 9–23.

Lake Coal.

The same is true as to mining coal for the lake trade. It can only be mined and shipped while lake navigation is open.

Record, p. 282, l. 2–5.
Record, p. 296, l. 8–46.

Ohio Mines are Competitors.

Mines in Ohio near Wheeling are plaintiff's competitors in supplying engine coal and in shipping coal for the lake trade.

Were members of Operators' Association holding joint conferences with United Mine Workers. Lorain Coal & Dock Co. was such a competitor.

So was the Pursglove mine.

Makes Individual Contracts with its Employees.

Since resuming non-union June 12, 1906, the Hitchman Company has made individual contracts with its employees whereby it aims to protect itself against the United Mine Workers of America in the efforts of that organization to unionize its mine again, and that agreement is evidenced by memorandum cards, signed by the men, reading as follows:

> "I am employed by, and work for, the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employee of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, and that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union, and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company I will not make any effort amongst its employees to bring about the unionizing of that mine, against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard same read."

The Controversy Between Plaintiff and the Defendants.

Hinges upon efforts of the United Mine Workers of America to carry out their contracts with union operators and to advance the cause of their own union.

(b) Resolution No. 8 of 1907 Convention of Sub-district No. 5 of District No. 6, U. M. W. of A.

Chicago Agreement of 1898.

We quote from Judge Dayton's opinion, Record, p. 665, beginning with line 24: "It appears clearly established that in 1898 this organization had a membership of over 30,000, the bulk of which resided in Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; that in that year they sought and secured a joint conference with an organization of coal operators, the employers of its members, in these States; such conference was had and as a result a distinct agreement was entered into. From the stenographic report (admitted to be correct) of the "Proceedings of Joint Conference of Coal Operators and Coal Miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana," subsequently held in Cincinnati, March 8–29, 1910, filed in this cause as "McKinley's Exhibit No. 4," the purport of this Chicago Agreement is fully disclosed. In reply to certain propositions presented by the defendant here, Mr. Lewis, then President of the Union, Mr. Maurer of Ohio read on behalf of the operators a statement from which I quote:

> "'The answer of the operators to the proposition of the miners, in order to be thoroughly understood, makes it necessary to recall the history of wage agreements, and trace with brevity the conditions under which we have from time to time met as operators and miners and effected such agreements, so as to show connectedly the factors which have controlled both parties up to the present time.
> "'In the years prior to any substantial agreement the conditions of the mining industry were very unsatisfactory in their influence upon both the operators of mines and the miners in the various competitive districts. A remedy for this state of chaos was earnestly sought by both parties, and resulted in the early '80's in agreements between the operators and miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. In 1886 the institution of contracts between miners and operators was effected. These contracts operated with varying degrees of success and failure for some years and until about the year 1894, when these relations were dissolved. The conditions again took on an aspect of demoralization, which continued with varying degrees of intensity, numerous strikes, lockouts, and consequent loss in wages and profits and sometimes injuries to property, until in the year 1898.

"'During this period the conditions were such, both as to the price received for coal by operators and the price paid to the miners, that it became imperative for the interests of each to reestablish in some form the former agreements. At this time the basing price of the Hocking district was 56 cents per ton for screened lump coal. For a short time immediately preceding that year, the mining rate was 51 cents. The working hours in the districts, parties to the early agreements, were from nine and a half to ten hours per day.

"'The chief evil was the fact that districts which did not recognize the United Mine Workers and had no agreements with them produced coal much more cheaply than those districts which sustained contractual relations with that organization. Some of the more important factors influencing these conditions were different methods of producing coal, varying costs of mining, different hours of labor, different sized screens, not mentioning various other elements.

"'In order to correct these most harmful conditions a joint convention of operators and miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, at the solicitation of the miners' officials, was called to meet at Chicago in January, 1898. At this convention an interstate joint agreement was established. After a long session of deliberation and negotiation, continuing over a period of about three weeks, the basing price for mining in Ohio and Pennsylvania was increased from 56 to 66 cents per ton, an advance of practically 18 per cent, and both the existing price and method of screening and weighing of coal was made uniform throughout the entire territory covered by the terms of the contract. As a result of the Chicago convention a representative meeting was subsequently held at Columbus, at which a uniform day-wage scale was established for inside labor. All of these concessions made by the operators were of substantial benefit to the miners.

" 'In addition to the advance in the price of mining and the other important concessions enumerated, the action of this convention had an effect of the most far-reaching and salutary character, not alone for the mine workers, but for the entire labor world, in the recognition of eight hours as constituting a day's labor, this being the first recognition of the eight-hour day by any large body of employers in the United States.

" 'The granting of the eight-hour day by the operators, after making these numerous other important concessions, was with the distinct understanding and explicit promise of the miners to give to the operators of the four contracting States adequate protection against the competition of the unorganized fields. From year to year they have been called upon to fulfill that promise.

" 'The operators, parties to that agreement, at the time of its execution felt that it was absolutely necessary to the safety of their investments that they be protected from the encroachments upon them by their competitors of the unorganized fields. The tonnage of the non-union fields entering into the competitive market, particularly of West Virginia and Kentucky, at that time was not so large, as it was aggressive and threatening, the total tonnage entering directly into competition from those fields being approximately 600,000 tons. Since, however, coal from this unorganized territory coming into direct competition with Ohio and Pennsylvania has so increased that a fair estimate places this competitive tonnage at 8,000,000 tons, which does not include the tonnage from non-union fields adjacent to the Pittsburgh district. The markets in western and northern Ohio, eastern Indiana, and Michigan, from year to year, have been encroached upon by coal from the unorganized districts until at the present time nearly 50 per cent of the coal consumed in these markets is supplied from fields operated with non-union labor. To find a market for the union tonnage displaced in the territory named, the mine owners of Ohio and Pennsylvania within the past five years, have made heavy investments and built and equipped large coal docks to secure the markets at the upper lake ports; but these operators now find the non-union coal rapidly commanding a heavy percentage of this market, when, at the time of the Chicago Agreement the non-union fields had but a small fraction of this trade, and unless these conditions are corrected the markets so secured will soon be replaced by the tonnage from West Virginia and Kentucky.

" 'Though in the very heart of the consuming territory, on account of the wide difference between the price of labor in the organized fields of Ohio and Pennsylvania and the unorganized fields of West Virginia, Kentucky, and the fields adjacent to the Pittsburgh district, Ohio and Western Pennsylvania are rapidly losing the markets at their very doors.

" 'It is evident to any candid observer that such unfair conditions should not be imposed upon the operators and miners of the unionized territory. That the interests of operators and miners are mutual in every respect does not admit of controversy. Each is equally concerned in rescuing this business from its present peril.

" 'Finally, we ask for the fulfillment of the pledge of 1898 upon which we made to the miners so many important and costly concessions. Though that promise has not been kept, we have continued for twelve years to make additional concessions by increasing the mining price from 66 cents agreed upon at that time, to 90 cents, and in other respects conceding demands without any compensating concessions upon the part of the miners, until we now find ourselves at the limit of financial safety. The operators can make no further concessions. It is now, in > our view, not only to the interest of the miners, but their duty, as well, to do their share to meet these conditions.'

"The Chicago agreement and its purposes as set forth by Maurer were subsequently admitted. In proof of this I quote from the remarks of Mr. Green, a defendant here, as follows:

> "'Our friend, Mr. Maurer, in the well prepared statement he has submitted to this convention, referred to an obligation he claims was assumed by the United Mine Workers of America in the meeting at Chicago in 1898. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we agreed to a certain extent that was right; but I do not believe it was ever understood that one party to this contract was obligated exclusively to carry out that promise. I believe it was intended to be a mutual understanding and that both sides would cooperate in trying to organize West Virginia and other non-union districts in order to extend this business like basis of adjusting our differences to those fields.
> "'Let me point to the fact that the United Mine Workers of America have diligently and aggressively attempted to carry out the promise made in Chicago in 1898; that they have done everything in their power to redeem any promise they may have made to organize West Virginia. Since 1898 our organization has at various times spent hundreds of thousands of dollars trying to unionize West Virginia. We have also sacrificed human life in the attempt to redeem that promise. In view of the fact that we have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars and that our organizers, our members who have gone there as missionaries in an attempt to redeem that promise have sacrificed their lives and their liberties, we should be given credit for what we have done. I want to ask the operators how much money they have spent and what they have done to aid us to organize West Virginia.

"'Is the fact that we have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars appropriated from the small earnings of our people in the Central Competitive Field, and the fact that we have sacrificed the liberty of some of our members any evidence that we have tried to redeem that promise? Does not that show that we have honestly, sincerely, and diligently attempted to redeem it? I believe, gentlemen, that if the operators had done one-half as much as the miners have done, if they had even cooperated with us in what we have done, West Virginia would be organized and the operators and miners of that State would be here today participating in this joint movement.'

"The 'plea in the nature of confession and avoidance' contained in the last paragraph of Mr. Green's argument had been advanced by Mr. Lewis and was urged by him in these words:

"'We want to say, and we say it kindly but positively to the gentlemen on the other side of the house, "Get together and organize, not only in Ohio and West Virginia—and I know a lot of you have influence enough over there, if you do as much work as we do, to organize them."'

"But at the same time, it is manifest that he recognized the danger of the public declaration of such purpose for, prior in the discussion, he had said:

"'If I have a proper conception of this movement it means the uplifting of the industry. If I have a proper conception of this movement it does not mean that either operators or miners can publicly say, "We will organize West Virginia in order that the miners of Ohio or Indiana can get more work." That has done more to prevent the organization of West Virginia than anything I know of. Coupled with that is the attitude of Ohio and Western Pennsylvania, probably of Indiana, and I know of some Illinois operators who have gone to West Virginia and have built human fences around their properties. I mean by that that they surround their properties with pickets, men who, even when the organizers of the United Mine Workers want to walk along a country or township road passing through the properties, is met at the property line and compelled to state what his business is before he can walk on the public highway. Men will say that that is not possible in a free country, but I say it is possible. It is possible in some mining districts in this country, and I believe they are in the United States, because they are in West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama and a few places in Pennsylvania.'

"I further quote from the remarks of Mr. Feehan of Pennsylvania, another member and representative of the Union, as follows:

"'We are unwilling that the non-union operators and miners of West Virginia or of any other coal field shall set the standard of prices and the standard of living for the intelligent operators and miners engaged in the mining industry in the States that are represented here. I believe that is the honest opinion of all of the operators who are present. It is unnecessary for me to refer to the fact that many of the operators who are represented here in this joint conference have interests in West Virginia and in other non-union coal fields whose products are going into the markets they are complaining of. It is true that they have contributed, with the other operators who are engaged in the industry in those States and districts, to keep the organization from obtaining a hold or becoming a factor in the industry in those fields, of which they complain. If they will withdraw their objections to the establishment of the organization in those fields, I am sure they would not be confronted with those conditions, and we would be able to remove the evil in a very brief time. The practices resorted to by the non-union operators of West Virginia are un-American.'

"Also from Mr. Maurer's reply:

"'We have a condition confronting this convention as grave as confronted the convention that met in Chicago in 1898. We have this great tonnage from the unorganized fields of West Virginia and Kentucky that is absolutely taking away from us our markets and taking away the employment which belongs to you. It is a condition that not one of us must meet, but that both of us must meet, not only for our protection but for your protection as well. The cost of living is only incident to it, and the mine-run basis is only incident to it. Every man who swings the pick will agree with me that we can pay you no more for mining coal than we can get for the product of your labor. And I am going to put up to you, I am willing to concede to this covention, that West Virginia is not organized; that for ten or twelve long years the miners have done everything in their power to organize that field, and that they did it diligently and earnestly is admitted, nevertheless that field today is unorganized. Nobody is to blame. Neither the operator nor the miner is to blame for that condition; but it is a condition that we must meet and each one bear his share of the burden. Eight million tons of the coal from that unorganized state is today taking away from you the product of your labor, and taking away from the operator every cent of profit he ever had in the business. You cannot correct that. You may say to us, "You must get together and agree upon prices; you must get the West Virginia operators in and agree upon a price." Why, every man who stands here knows that if the operators in the State of Ohio attempt it they do so in violation of the Valentine law and that the penitentiary stares them in the face. Every miner here knows that if in the States of Ohio and West Virginia the operators were to attempt anything of the kind, they would violate, not only the Valentine law of Ohio, but they would violate the Sherman Anti-trust Law. It is easy to tell us what to do, but you should also tell us how to do it. Does any miner here believe that the operators of the State of Ohio have not tried to get the best price they can for their commodity? We have some interest in our business, we have our money invested in it, and I assure you that for two years the miners and the railroads have got every cent there was in it, and more too.

"'However, we stayed in the market, we gave you employment. Now it is up to the miners of this State to meet those conditions and bear their share of that burden. I want to tell you here that if the miners of the State of Ohio insist on an increased price of their coal they will lose every bit of business they have on the Great Lakes. You have already lost your commercial business. Who supplies Michigan today with commercial coal? Who supplies Detroit? Who supplies Toledo? Who supplies Marion? Who supplies Columbus, right in the heart of the Hocking District? Who supplies Eastern Indiana? Who supplies all of Western Ohio? Tell me, tell me, you miners from the Hocking Valley, who have seen your mines lay idle while West Virginia coal in train load lots has gone past your mines! Tell me, you miners in Eastern Ohio, who have stood idly by and watched Fairmont coal in train load lots taking your markets! Ninety per cent of that market is supplied by West Virginia coal from the non-union fields. I say to you the cost of living does not enter into this. I say to you these other elements did not enter into this. I say to you that the best price we can get for our coal under the competitive conditions will not admit of it.

"'You miners who mine coal in the State of Ohio, and, if you please, in Western Pennsylvania, know that every bit of the trade I refer to was formerly supplied by Ohio and Pennsylvania, even down to the gas business, but it is now supplied by West Virginia.'

"And from Mr. Lewis' rejoinder:

"'Now the argument is made that we ought to turn our attention to West Virginia and stop the competition from that State. I admit that argument is good; but in order for that argument to have strength it is necessary for the operators at home to stop the kind of guerilla warfare they have among themselves.

"'Mr. Maurer has very well said—and I am glad he has brought the subject up—that we say to the operators, "Get a better price for your coal in order that you can pay us a better price for our labor." Then he supplements that statement, and very properly, by the statement that if they were to organize to get a better price for their coal they would be haled into court under the provisions of the Valentine law of Ohio and possibly sent to the penitentiary. Probably we would too. He supplements that statement by asking us to tell them how to get a better price for their coal. I am going to tell you. First, stop making war on the railroads. The poor fellows need help! And this proposition is going to be no joke. I recognize what the mining industry is; I recognize that it is more important than transportation. I recognize that the Valentine law of the State of Ohio was put on the statute books by a lot of political demagogues who believe they were working in the interests of the dear people—and they did it once for the dear people and about twenty times for themselves! I recognize that this industry does not occupy the plane among the industries of the country that it ought to occupy, because we have met in joint conventions year after year and discussed our wage relations instead of devoting some of our time to going out and telling certain people to keep their hands off our business. The railroad companies of this country say to the mine owners, "We want our fuel at a certain rate." The mine owners, in order to get a part of the fuel trade of the railroads, put down the prices in some instances to cost, not because of competition, but because of your desire to get a part of that trade. Then after securing a part of that trade the official representatives of the railroads are in so close touch with the leaders of the manufacturing industries of our country that the steam trade, as we call it, buys fuel almost at as cheap a price as the railroad company. Then in order to make ends meet somebody must pay a better price, and it is usually the domestic consumers, the masses of the people. And that is where the political demagogues get their work in, because they are the people who have votes and that is why they have anti-conspiracy laws placed on the statute books.'

"Mr. Chapman of Ohio, an operator, contributed to the discussion some figures, as follows:

"'It is an admitted fact that there is a difference today of between 40 and 50 cents per ton in the cost of production of coal in the union fields of Ohio and the non-union fields of the trade east and south of us in West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama, and three of those States, gentlemen, are competitors in the markets of Ohio coal—West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

"'The production of West Virginia for 1907 was 40,043,311 gross tons, 44,091,000 being net tons. In 1908 the production was 44,091,000 net tons. In 1909 the production was 44,495,000 net tons.

"'Ohio's production for 1907 was 32,365,949 net tons; in 1908, 26,287,800 net tons, and in 1909, 27,756,172 net tons.

"'There are some more interesting statistics connected with this proposition. The following are the numbers of days the miners worked in West Virginia during the years from 1904 to 1909: 1904, 209; 1905, 213; 1906, 237; 1907, 234; 1908, 211; 1909, 192; making an average of 216 days of ten hours per day, or a total of 2,160 hours work each year. Reduced to eight hours per day would be an average of 270 days each year. Ohio worked in 1904, 164 days; 1905, 171; 1906, 175; 1907, 204; 1908, 157; 1909, 165 days, an average for the six years of 173 days, or 97 days less than the average work in West Virginia on the eight-hour basis.'

"And then said:

"'Now, gentlemen, it is useless, after the discussions that have taken place here by the gentlemen who preceded me, to discuss at any great length the market that the non-union fields have taken from Ohio in the past. It has been well said that they are putting coal into Columbus, into Michigan, into Detroit, taking the markets that heretofore have been enjoyed by Ohio coal. In the city of Athens, Ohio, which is within three miles of several of the large producing Hocking Valley mines, West Virginia coal is being sold. The gentlemen who are familiar with the situation have informed me that over 2,000 tons of West Virginia coal was sold there between the first of September and a short time ago. Even in the town of Logan, one of the points where Hocking Valley gathers its trains to start its coal out to the markets they have, West Virginia is taking that market. The gentlemen who were in the Toledo convention and returned on the Hocking Valley train, if they had their eyes open, would have seen full solid trains of Norfolk and Western coal passing up over that road to Toledo. There was not a single car of Hocking Valley coal in the trains. At the town of Bowling Green, twenty miles south of Toledo, when I came through a few weeks ago, I saw every car of coal standing on the side tracks were loaded with West Virginia coal.

"'Think of the proposition, gentlemen! Toledo, the central point at which several Ohio coal roads bring everything, and 60 per cent or more of the coal being consumed there is from West Virginia! The Pennsylvania people have a road coming in there, the Wheeling and Lake Erie have a road coming in there, the Toledo and Ohio Central goes in there, the Hocking Valley goes in there, and the D. T. & I. goes in there on a direct line. Now just consider that proposition for a minute, and is it any wonder that Ohio coal operators and interests are in the condition they are today with that state of affairs?

"It was well said by Mr. Lewis and Mr. Penna that people buy their fuel where they can buy it cheapest. I am not through with this proposition. I want to bring you to the city we are now holding this convention in and give you a few figures. In 1897 Pittsburg shipped by river 1,401,000 tons of coal to the city of Cincinnati. The Kanawha region shipped by river 717,000 tons of coal. The Kanawha field shipped by rail 704,000 tons. The other interests from West Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee shipped here 275,400 tons. Now we will come to the year 1908.

"'Pittsburg District shipped 535,000 tons to the city of Cincinnati in 1908 as against 10,041,000 (manifestly a mistake—should be 1,401,000) in 1897. Kanawha shipped by river 867,000 tons in 1908, as against 717,000 tons in 1897, and Kanawha shipped by rail in 1908 1,848,000 tons, as against 462,000 in 1897. The Pocahontas District, the Tennessee and Alabama fields shipped in 1908 by rail 1,512,000 tons to the city of Cincinnati as against 275,400 in 1907.'

"The reasons why West Virginia coals are able to supplant those of Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Indiana and Illinois, operations in which both sides of this conference were so vitally interested, are contributed by both operator and mine representative.

"By Mr. Chapman, operator:

"'It is not surprising that West Virginia is on a mine-run basis. Why? Because a large per cent of all the fine coal that is produced in that state is made into coke. They even crush the lump coal after they produce it to make coke, which is much more valuable product to them and yields them more returns than the raw coal will. We haven't any of those coals in Ohio or Indiana and they have none of them in Western Pennsylvania outside of the coking coal as it is known there.'

"By Mr. Feehan, mine representative:

"There is one point I want to bring out that has not been made clear, and that is the disadvantage the operators of Eastern Ohio are put to in competing for the markets against the operators who have interests in West Virginia, and that is the character of the veins. In West Virginia it is not an uncommon thing to have them develop from six to ten feet of clean coal. There is no slate to remove; it is easily mined; it is a good grade of coal; it can find a market; and when you take into consideration the cost of producing a ton of that coal compared with the little five-foot vein of coal in Eastern Ohio with its many impurities and its thick slate, and the Pittsburg District, with its weak roof, where in many cases it is difficult to operate a machine, as well as many other natural disadvantages the operators have, herein lies the cause of the competition more than in the cost of labor. The cost of labor is not the important factor that is crowding the eastern Ohio operators out of the market on the lakes or elsewhere. It is the natural disadvantages that is doing it. There is one advantage the operators in Eastern Ohio have, and that is their geographical situation. They are nearer the lake markets and other markets, and I believe they have an advantage of from 15 to 25 cents a ton in freight rates. I understand that when the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission goes into effect they will have even greater advantages in freight rates. It is fortunate for them that they have these advantages. Were it not for their advantages in the matter of freight rates I am positive that many of the veins of coal now being worked in Ohio and elsewhere would be abandoned, and they would wait until the big veins with the greater natural advantages in West Virginia were worked out before they would again operate there. These factors have not been seriously enough considered heretofore."

"By Mr. Chapman:

"'In 1907 and 1908 the miners earned more money in West Virginia at the prices they were paid there than were earned by Ohio. In fact they earned from one hundred to one hundred and fifty dollars more to the man. That tells the tale concerning that matter. * * *

"'The coals of West Virginia are said to be mined at about one-half the cost of producing Ohio coals and the West Virginia product has taken the Ohio markets to the full extent permitted by the difference in transportation expenses, leaving Ohio coals only such markets as may be near the mines, and as the means of transportation increases by which West Virginia coals are put farther into Ohio markets, the prospect of the Ohio mines is not bright.'

"I quote further from the remarks of Mr. Savage, one of the defendants here, as follows:

"'Mr. Savage, Ohio: I was surprised a minute ago to hear that some of the operators were not in sympathy with the men in trying to get a readjustment of their freight rates in Ohio. I know as one miner we did all we possibly could in giving testimony before the commission in Columbus, and from what I heard then I believed, and I believe now, that the operators were absolutely right in asking for this readjustment. I believe I can assure you that we will help you in every manner that we can to get that readjustment. But we would ask you, on the other hand, if we are willing to help you—and by helping you we agree we are helping ourselves—if you operators from Ohio and Pennsylvania will lend us the same assistance in West Virginia in getting the mining price up so that competition will not prevail. When we ask that what do we find? Operators have told me in years past that they were willing to have the miners organized in Ohio, but they were not willing that their miners should be organized in West Virginia. We find as great opposition on the part of the operators from this State who have mines in West Virginia as we find from the operators resident there. If we are going to work along the line of mutual benefit, let us make West Virginia a union State. Go down there and practice what you preach in Ohio. Help us get the protection of the law in that State and I think we can organize the miners. Instead of helping us, what have you done? You have done nothing but retard the progress of our organization in that State. The reason they have assigned to me for their attitude was that the calibre of the men employed in the mines of West Virginia was such that if they were organized it would be impossible to control them. I believe that a large percentage of those men are as intelligent as we are, and once they understand the benefits of the organization and the benefits of the contract we enter into, they will observe those contracts as religiously as the miners in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana or any other State.'

"And finally from Mr. Zerbe of Ohio, an operator:

"'A very considerable amount of censure and criticism has been put upon some operators who are here because of the fact that they have gone to West Virginia and found investments. I will remind the other side of the house that the men who have gone into Virginia are business men; they are engaged in the coal industry, and they bring the commodity from one State or another to furnish fuel for such contracts as they take. They have found by experience that you as an organized body are not treating them fairly where they are circumscribed in the production of this commodity. They find that you are putting upon them burdens in the organized fields that do not exist in the unorganized fields. By reason of the fact that you cannot control in the production of this commodity, although we are willing to admit you have made an effort, their market is being taken from them or restricted or narrowed, and many of them in self-defense find it necessary, in order to carry out contracts and fulfill their obligations to those who take this commodity from them, to go to West Virginia and invest in properties there that they may continue a business for which they are obligated. * * *

"'We might argue this up one side and down another for a year and we would be no nearer a solution of this proposition. We are, when we get through, right up against the one proposition we cannot get through which has been created by the competition brought to bear against us by the operators and the miners of West Virginia in the unorganized field.'

"It is impossible to deny the conclusions to be drawn from all this. By reason of the natural advantages in the way of superior veins, roofs and quality, West Virginia coals can be mined for something like fifty per cent less than those of Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois, and then even, her miners can make better wages; the officers and members of this Union are almost wholly resident of Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois; in 1898 as an organization they entered into a direct contract with the operators of that field for and in consideration of an eight hour labor day and other concessions, to organize the West Virginia miners and, by reason of the control they would have under the Union's laws over such miners when so organized, 'protect' these operators in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois from the existing open competition even then threatening the markets of such operators, especially in the West and the Lake regions. For the purpose of carrying out the agreement, this labor organization has, in the language of the defendant, Green, one of its officers, 'at various times spent hundreds of thousands of dollars trying to unionize West Virginia' and 'sacrificed human life in the attempt to redeem that promise.' Was this in the interest of and for the bettering of mine laborers in West Virginia? It is impossible to see how it could be for in this conference between the operators and Union representatives in March, 1910, as we have shown, direct statistics were given by Mr. Chapman and not controverted, showing that the West Virginia miners, unorganized, were getting more work and more wages than miners in this unionized field of Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois. In illustration of this, it seems to me that I may properly refer to conditions as they exist today, as disclosed by a public report made to the Governor of the State of West Virginia by a commission appointed by him to investigate and report upon such conditions. The members of this commission were Bishop P. J. Donahue of the Catholic Diocese of this State, Capt. S. L. Walker of the State Militia, and F. O. Blue, State Tax Commissioner, men of the highest character and integrity. From this report and current history, it appears that the effort to unionize West Virginia still continues and has more recently been directed to the Paint Creek and Cabin Creek fields in Kanawha County; that such efforts have led to such a condition of riot, bloodshed and general lawlessness as to require the Governor of the State to twice put the district under martial law to save life and property. I quote from the report as to the condition of the miners:

> "'To this inquiry we have devoted special attention within the limits of the time and opportunity at our disposal, and after careful personal investigation, supplemented by a great body of formal sworn testimony sifted and tested by severe and exhaustive cross examination, this Commission has arrived at the unanimous conclusion that the general surroundings of the miners on Paint Creek and Cabin Creek respectively are very good, when compared with those of the miners of the few unionized plants on the right bank of the Kanawha and with those of the miners throughout the state and the nation. We have gone into their houses and carefully examined them. They are above the average of miners' homes in most places.'

"And as to wages:

"'A careful consideration of the evidence adduced leads us to the following conclusions:

"(1) The average annual wage of miners in West Virginia for the years 1905–11, inclusive, is $554.26.

"(2) The average annual wage of miners on Paint Creek and Cabin Creek is from $600.00 to $700.00.

"(3) The average wage on Paint Creek and Cabin Creek (non-union) is fully equal to if not greater than that of the miners in the very limited number of unionized plants in the State on the opposite bank of the Kanawha River."

"'These figures may appear small and inadequate, but, slender as they are, they exceed the average wage obtained in Illinois, a unionized state, which is but $510.86 a year. We have been unable to secure any official figures as to the average annual wage in the unionized States of Indiana, Western Pennsylvania and Ohio. But we are informed by experts and we believe that the average wage in the two States first mentioned probably falls a little below that prevailing in Illinois; while the annual wage in Ohio, owing to local mining conditions, falls a little below those of Western Pennsylvania. This classification, in the order of the rewards of labor, puts West Virginia at the head of the list. If we inquire into these figures more closely we find they are very substantially affected by several causes, among which comes first the unwillingness of a large number of the miners to work more than four days a week at the most. A minute examination of the payrolls discloses the fact that sixteen or seventeen days in the month constitute a high average, and that many engaged in the mines decline to labor more than twelve or fourteen days. This is particularly true of some of the native born miners and many colored men and results in the necessity of keeping twenty or thirty per cent more miners in a given operation than would be required if steady application to work were the rule. At several of the mines in the districts under investigation were found men wholly illiterate and without any special knowledge or skill, other than that acquired by their daily experience, earning four to five and in some cases even six dollars a day of eight or nine hours; men with savings bank accounts of one or two thousand dollars and others who had purchased out of their savings small farms or other properties adjacent to the mines.'

"And as to the causes of the trouble.:

"'This arises, in our judgment, from the efforts of the United Mine Workers to organize the union in the whole chain of plants along said creeks. Their desire is to make the present strike region the place for the insertion of the thin edge of the wedge of Unionism with the ultimate aim of organizing the whole State. The frank declaration on oath of Mr. Thos. Cairns, Local President of District No. 17, would appear to put this intention beyond the region of doubt. The United Mine Workers' association contends that this is essential to the well being of the seventy-six thousand or more miners of West Virginia. That by this means and this alone can their lot be improved, their rights safeguarded, and the standard of living so raised as to bring it up to a level befitting a citizen, howsoever lowly, of this republic. All classes of people, recognizing the force of the adage "In union there is strength," do so organize. Even the operators themselves form associations; "Why," say the toilers, "should we also not unite in lawful combinations"? The operators cannot and do not resist this right as a general proposition, but their claim is that the peculiar industrial conditions in West Virginia would render it ruinous and therefore impossible for them to recognize the Union. The geographical position of this State is such, together with the small consumption within her own borders, that of her total coal output of over sixty millions of tons, she markets barely ten per cent within her own borders and ninety per cent or more must be hauled to the market through the competing territories of Pennsylvania, Ohio,

Indiana and Illinois known as the four competitive States; that the operators of said States have always on the floors of joint miners' and mine-owners' conventions shown fierce and undisguised hostility to this State, endeavoring in every way to crowd her out of the market and going the length of stating by the mouth of one of Pennsylvania's leading operators, that the opening of mines here at all was "an economic blunder." Resort has even been had to the Interstate Commerce Commission resulting in reduction of rates to the material advantage of the competitors of West Virginia operators in freight differentials. It has been claimed too, and with some appearance of probability, that the operators of the said four competitive States are hand and glove with the United Mine Workers in their attempts to unionize West Virginia so that the representatives of the coal interests of this State must go with their relative small representation into conventions to regulate conditions and prices and would come home having rates imposed upon them which, taking into consideration the heavy differentials in railroad hauls, would practically put them out of business and close every mine in the State. They decline, they say, to be wiped out in such fashion; they claim the right to settle their own affairs within the borders of their own State. Even if they come to terms with the district authorities of the United Mine Workers here in West Virginia those terms may not be approved at the headquarters at Indianapolis, and all the labored attempts at amicable adjustment may fall through. Further they claim that the few unionized mines in West Virginia do not and cannot obtain anything like an adequate return on the capital invested. And so, to probe this deplorable situation down to the bedrock of facts, the geographical position of West Virginia is largely responsible for all this industrial strife. Our retarded manufacturing development is also a contributing cause. The consumption of coal within our borders, as elsewhere noted herein, particularly by manufactories, is almost negligible. No

State in the Nation has more inviting natural resources nor offers greater inducements to manufacturing enterprise than West Virginia—great areas of superior coal for steam and coke, splendid timber of many species, almost inexhaustible supply of natural gas and unlimited water power awaiting to be utilized in the arts of industry. It is impossible not to recognize the merit of, and to sympathize with, many of the contentions on both sides of this unhappy quarrel. Most assuredly each party believes unreservedly in the justice of its claim. It is in the attempted enforcement of them that each has passed the limits of justice to say nothing of christian charity and broad humanity. Two facts loom big over the smaller ones developed in this bulk of testimony—the desperate efforts and often unwarranted and unlawful acts of the United Miners to force the union into the disturbed districts, and the equally desperate, unwarranted and unlawful acts of the operators and their agents to keep the union out. Thus, for months before the acutal break, union agitators, many of them strangers, attempted to invade Paint Creek and Cabin Creek to persuade the miners to join the union. They called meetings of the workers and described to them the hardships and injustice of their lot and the oppression under which they suffered. The wildest theories concerning the rights of property and the means of production were propounded and advocated, and doctrines closely verging upon anarchy were upheld with such effect that men, who before were living peaceably and in comparative prosperity, purchased Winchesters, revolvers, blackjacks and other murderous weapons to shoot down the coal "barons" and their myrmidons. Mild eyed men, seventy-five per cent of them with usually cool Anglo-Saxon blood in their veins and with instincts leading to law and order inherited down through the centuries gradually saw red, and with minds bent on havoc and slaughter marched from union districts across the river like Hugheston, Cannelton and Boomer, patrolled the woods overhanging the creek bed and the mining plants, finally massing on the ridges at the head waters and arranging a march to sweep down Cabin Creek and destroy everything before them to the junction. Meanwhile, the operators hurried in over a hundred guards heavily armed, purchased several deadly machine guns and many thousands of rounds of ammunition. Several murders were perpetrated and all who could, got away; men, women and children fled in terror and many hid in cellars and caves. If ever there was a case for some strong measure like martial law, the conditions prevailing on Monday, September 2, 1912, the eve of the proclamation, presented it. In fact, in the opinion of expert witnesses on the scene, martial law, and martial law alone, was the only measure to meet the desperate situation. We believe, partly on the evidence adduced, and in part from the personal knowledge of two members of the Commission who were on the ground, one in active military service, that but for such proclamation taking effect on Tuesday, September 3, at daylight, there would have been great destruction of property and loss of life in the strike zone. The enormous quantities of Winchesters, revolvers and other weapons up to machine guns captured from both sides and brought to camp at Paint Creek Junction also bore mute, but eloquent, witness of the height to which the passions of the opposing forces had mounted.

" 'Now these propositions, trite and fundamental as they are, will assist us to apportion the blame for the strike and the subsequent disorders on Paint Creek and Cabin Creek and the close neighborhood:

" 'First. Every man has a right to quit his employment and seek other work for any grievance he has or injustice which he may conceive to have been done to him, but

" 'Second. He has absolutely no right to obstruct, molest, threaten or otherwise prevent another man from taking the position he has of his own accord abandoned. Organized society and natural law can never yield one jot or tittle on that head. To do so would be to acquiesce in the régime of brute force—a veritable reign of terror.

"'Third. Labor has the right to organize for its benefit, protection, increase of wages, and better living conditions, and to have recognition of such organization, but "'Fourth. Its organization has no right to coerce by threats or violence any one to become affiliated with it when he does not desire to do so; nor to assault or put in bodily fear one who desires to labor without belonging to it; nor to destroy property of the employer who does not desire to contract with it; nor to violate its contract with its employer without cause.

"'There is abundant evidence before us that a reign of terror was attempted to be organized in the strike district and outside of it. It is true that the officers of the United Mine Workers professed to counsel moderation and a strict observance of law and order on various occasions, but there is testimony tending strongly to show that harangues delivered in public, and of which stenographic reports have been submitted as exhibits, incited the miners to violence and in some cases to murder. These harangues were in some instances delivered in the presence of officers of the United Mine Workers' Association and from platforms upon which they stood and from which they, too, spoke; but the murderous and anarchistic utterances referred to were never disclaimed or disapproved by them either at the time or subsequent to their delivery. Furthermore, there is some evidence tending to show that officers stood by without interfering or protesting while non-union men were brutally beaten. Again, the warning to other miners from outside not to come into the strike region published for many weeks in their local organ and also filed as an exhibit and amounting in effect to a grave threat, throws a strong light on the actual situation. We fear that the net result of the action and utterances of those acting and speaking under the apparent sanction and approval of the officers of the United Mine Workers was to foment bitter feeling and to incite to serious breaches of the peace. In all this, even granting that they were not acting against any express law set down in the statute books, yet they were acting against the fundamental principles of right and justice.'

"These commissioners also examined the mining conditions existing in the Fairmont and Norfolk and Western regions of the State. I cannot extend this opinion by quoting further from it but am justified in saying that they found and report such conditions to be in effect very superior to those obtaining elsewhere in unionized fields; conditions under which men have remained in continuous employment for fifteen to twenty years; have saved money and purchased homes and farms; have furnished to them houses comfortable, with electric lights, some with shower baths, good sanitation and water supply, and with wages such as to enable the foreign-born miners in the forty-four operations of the Consolidated Coal Company (Fairmont field) to send from $125,000 to $150,000 annually to their dependent relatives in Europe.

"All the evidence in this voluminous record goes to show pretty conclusively that the fourteen years' struggle of this labor organization since it entered into the compact with the operators of Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois in 1898 to unionize the operations in West Virginia has not been in the interest either of the betterment of mine labor in the State or of upholding that free commerce in coal between the States guaranteed by Federal law, but to restrain and even destroy it in West Virginia for the benefit of these unionized competitive States. It may be unfortunate for those States that nature has favored West Virginia, Kentucky and other Southern States by giving them better coal and less expensive mining conditions, but this does not warrant the operators and miners there to combine and confederate for the purpose of depriving the consuming public of the right to purchase the better coal at the lower cost, if desired. Such a combination is clearly a common law conspiracy, too far reaching to be reasonable, in restraint of trade, as well, in my judgment, a direct violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust law. It is further, in my judgment, a combination or conspiracy against the rights of the many thousands of non-union miners in West Virginia who are entitled to enjoy the advantages in their labor that nature has given them."

Resolution No. 8 of 1907 Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6.

Text of

"RESOLUTION NO. 8.

"Whereas, there are mines in the Panhandle District and Ohio that are not organized, and believing every mine should be organized; be it

"Resolved, by this ninth annual convention that the sub-district officers, together with the district officers, be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the sub-district as quickly as it can be done."

Record, p. 414, l. 35–42.

(a) The immediate moving cause for the adoption of this resolution is found in the report of the Secretary-Treasurer, Lee Rankin, one of the defendants, in his report to that Sub-District Convention, which is quoted below:

"We have one mine at Bellaire, Ohio, and five mines in the Panhandle district which I believe should be organized. I believe those mines can be organized and in my opinion this convention should adopt some plan to organize those mines."

Report of Secy-Treas. Lee Rankin, p. 10, l. 34–38. (Original document transmitted to U. S. Supreme Court.)

Record, p. 414, l. 21–30.

(b) Hitchman mine was one of those intended to be organized under this resolution.

Record, p. 415, l. 15–22.

(c) The Glendale mine and the Richland mine were also intended to be organized under this resolution.

Record, p. 414, l. 13–49.
Record, p. 415, l. 1–48.

(d) These defendants made efforts to induce the Hitchman Company to agree to again run a union mine after it started up non-union June 12, 1906, and before their organizer, Hughes, appeared at the plant in the fall of 1907.

(e) Some of the defendants who, before the organizer, Hughes, appeared, tried to induce the Hitchman Company to reunionize, subsequently appeared to assist Hughes in his work—thus connecting them up with Hughes in the entire scheme.

Record, p. 358, l. 17–36.

(f) The efforts of organizer Hughes were successful.

(1) At the Richland mine Hughes got about 50 men to join the union and then he shut the mine down.

Record, p. 432, l. 6–31.

(2) At the Glendale mine Hughes got 20 men to join the union and quit work.

That mine was crippled but it continued to operate.

(3) At the Hitchman mine Hughes got sixty men to join the union, and defendants stated that they were going to shut the Hitchman mine down as soon as they got a few more men, and that all of the mines in the Panhandle district would have to recognize the union or remain closed.

Record, p. 415, l. 25–33.

The Richland, the Glendale, and the Hitchman Companies then filed their bills for injunctions in the District (then Circuit) Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, and were awarded temporary restraining orders. Temporary injunctions were granted later on in each case and by agreement of counsel and Court further progress in the Richland case and in the Glendale case was stayed until there should be a final decision by this Court in the Hitchman case, which, it was agreed, should be made a test case.

See plaintiff's Documentary Exhibits Nos. 7, 15, 11, and 16, and decree of November 5, 1910, in the Glendale case, suspending further action in the Glendale case, pending disposition of the Hitchman case, all of which documentary exhibits and the decree mentioned are, as introduced in evidence in the Hitchman case, before this Court.

(Original documents transmitted to U. S. Supreme Court.)

If unionized, West Virginia operators would have to go with their relatively small representation into joint conventions between union operators, their competitors, and the United Mine Workers, to regulate conditions and prices, and would come home having conditions and prices imposed upon them which, taking into consideration the heavy differentials in railroad hauls, would practically put them out of business and close every mine in the State.

How the Union Can Carry Out the Contract it made by the Chicago Agreement to Substantially Restrain or Suppress Coal Mining in West Virginia.

On this point we again quote from Judge Dayton's opinion, Record, p. 680, beginning with line 50:

"But the question at once arises, how could this union carry out this contract with the operators of Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Illinois to substantially restrain or suppress coal mining in West Virginia, Kentucky and other States by unionizing them? This brings us squarely to an examination of its constitution, manual, obligations, by-laws and rules, by which, according to the English decisions, the legality or illegality of such combinations is to be determined. Turning to these, which are in evidence and not denied, we find that when a miner is initiated into this organization he is required to take an obligation for life, as follows:

> "'I do sincerely promise of my own free will to abide by the laws of this union; to bear true allegiance to, and keep inviolate the principles of the United Mine Workers of America; never to discriminate against a fellow-worker on account of creed, color, or nationality; to defend freedom of thought, whether expressed by tongue or pen, to defend on all occasions and to the extent of my ability the members of our organization.
> "'That I will not reveal to any employer or boss the name of any one a member of our union. That I will assist all members of our organization to obtain the highest wages possible for their work; that I will not accept a brother's job who is idle for advancing the interests of the union or seeking better remuneration for his labor; and, as the mine workers of the entire country are competitors in the labor world, I promise to cease work at any time I am called upon by the organization to do so. And I further promise to help and assist all brothers in adversity, and to have all mine workers join our union that we may all be able to enjoy the fruits of our labor; that I will never knowingly wrong a brother or see him wronged if I can prevent it.

"'To all this I pledge my honor to observe and keep as long as life remains, or until I am absolved by the United Mine Workers of America.'

"This obligation is required under assurance beforehand that it will require 'nothing contrary to your civil or religious duties,' yet it does in fact require him to alienate for life or until the Union absolves him 'his freedom to dispose of his own labor or his own capital according to his own will * * * make himself a slave' contrary to all law, English, American and common, and in express violation of the bill of rights set forth in the Constitution of West Virginia. It binds him never to accept employment in place of a fellow member 'idle for advancing the interests of the Union or seeking better remuneration for his labor' no matter how anxious he may be to secure work, how well satified he might be with the wage offered, and how much he may need the work by reason of a starving family on his hands to support. It further binds him 'to cease work at any time I am called upon by the organization to do so,' regardless of the dire consequence that may result to him and those dependent upon him. It may well be said that such provisions under the law cannot be enforced. No, not legally, but practically it is different. His refusal to comply with this obligation subjects or may subject him to such social ostracism on the part of his fellow members as to compel obedience. They may taunt him with being without honor or integrity, they may call him 'black sheep,' 'scab' and other opprobrious epithets given new meanings in the English language because of just such conditions arising under the operations of these labor combinations, and they may and do drive him out of work and the community as shown by the facts set forth in many decisions of the courts of this country. But this is immaterial from a legal standpoint for, as I have shown, the law distinctly bans such obligations as unlawful and, therefore, the requiring them on the part of these labor organizations is unlawful. But to further show how complete control the Union thus obtains and how complete the surrender to such control on the part of the member is I quote further from the Constitution of its national organization as follows:

"'ARTICLE I.

"'Sec. 3. This organization shall be composed of International, District, Sub-District and Local Unions.

"'Sec. 4. The International Union shall have jurisdiction over all Districts, Sub-Districts and Local Unions, which shall be governed by this Constitution.

"'ARTICLE II.

"'Section 1. The officers of the Union shall be one President, one Vice-President, one Secretary-Treasurer, and an Executive Board to be composed of one member from each district under the jurisdiction of the United Mine Workers, each district to elect its members of the International Executive Board, the President, Vice-President and Secretary-Treasurer to be members of the Board by reason of their position.

"'ARTICLE IV.

"'Sec. 11. The funds of the organization shall be used for the purpose of assisting those who are in need from idleness or distress, when the payment of the same has been approved by the International Executive Board.

"ARTICLE VII.

"'Cards.

"'Section 1. Local Unions shall provide each member with a Due Card, upon which the dues and assessments paid by the member shall be entered, which shall be his receipt for the same.

"'Sec. 2. Due Cards shall not admit any person to membership from one local to another, and to protect the membership of individuals who are unable to pay their dues because of no Local existing where they reside, the International, District and Sub-District Secretaries shall, upon the payment of dues and assessments by said member, issue the usual cards for the same; provided that this shall not apply to a member living in a locality where a Local Union is in existence.

"'Sec. 3. No person a member of the organization, who holds a Due or Transfer Card showing him to be a member in good standing, shall be debarred or hindered from obtaining work on account of race, creed or nationality. Cards properly filled out and signed by the officers of miners' unions in foreign countries shall be accepted in lieu of initiation fees.

"'Sec. 4. Any member desiring to leave the mine where his Local is located and work elsewhere shall immediately make application to the Secretary of the Local for a Transfer Card, and if he has paid all dues and assessments, the President and Recording Secretary shall issue a Transfer Card to him, which shall be attested by the Financial Secretary, providing the Local Union is in good standing with the International, District and Sub-District Unions, which shall be accepted in any District, and in case such person cannot produce a Transfer Card he shall pay the regular initiation fee. All Transfer Cards shall be deposited as the laws of the District where work is secured may direct.

"'Sec. 5. When a person who has not been a member of the organization three months or more secures a Transfer Card from a Local Union in a District where a dispensation has been granted said Transfer Card shall not be accepted by any Local in a different District from the one in which the Local issuing the same is located, unless said Transfer Card is accompanied by an amount equal to the difference between the initiation fee paid by said member and the initiation fee provided for in the District where the card is deposited.

"'Sec. 6. No card shall be issued to any member when the Local is three or more months in arrears to the International, District or Sub-District for dues or assessments. Officers of any Local Union issuing cards in violation of any Section of Article VII shall be fined $10.00 for each card issued, the fine to be collected in the same manner as dues and assessments.

"'Sec. 7. The Transfer Card must show that the member receiving it has paid all dues and assessments for the month in which it was issued, and must also show at what class of labor he was employed.

"'Sec. 8. When a Transfer Card is issued to any member, it must be deposited by him with some Local Union or with the International Secretary-Treasurer, within three months after the last day of the month in which it was issued to him, else the card will become void and he can only become a member again by initiation as a new member.

"'Sec. 9. When a member presents a Transfer Card to a Local Union at any mine where he works or desires to work, the Local Union must accept the same and admit him to membership in that Local, unless the local issuing the same is not in good standing as shown by the monthly report of the Secretary-Treasurer, or the person to whom the card is issued has not been a member of the organization for three months as provided for in Section 5 of this Article, and shall collect from him all dues and assessments from the time between the last day of the month in which the card was issued and the date of depositing the same.

" 'Sec. 10. The Sub-District, District or International Secretary-Treasurer shall not accept a Transfer Card if the member is where he can deposit with a Local Union.

" 'Sec. 11. The International Secretary-Treasurer shall prepare and send out monthly a statement of all Locals three months or more in arrears for dues and assessments, and no Local Union shall refuse to accept a Transfer Card from any Local unless it appears on said list as being in bad standing. Local Unions on strike shall be exempt from the provisions of this section.

" 'Sec. 12. All Transfer Cards shall be made in book form, with two stubs attached. The books to be numbered, and each card in the book to be numbered and bear the number of the book. The stubs to be printed in conformity with the card itself. The card and one stub to be filled out by the Recording Secretary and certified to by the President and Financial Secretary of the Local Union granting the same; one stub to be retained by the Local issuing the card for future reference, the other stub to accompany the card and must be immediately filled out by the Secretary of the Local where the card is deposited, and returned by him to the Secretary of the Local that issued the card.

" 'Sec. 13. The President, Financial and Recording Secretary of the Local Union shall keep a record of all Transfer Cards bought by, issued by and deposited in their respective Local Unions. The Auditing Committee shall compare their records every three months, and in the presence of the Local Union destroy all Transfer Cards that have been deposited that there is no dispute about.

" 'ARTICLE XII.

" 'Sec. 2. Districts may adopt such laws for their government as they deem necessary, provided they do not conflict with the International Union.

" 'ARTICLE XIII.

" 'Sec. 2. Sub-Districts may adopt such laws for their government as they may deem necessary, provided they do not conflict with International and District Constitutions or agreements entered into.

" 'Sec. 3. All Local Unions within the territory of Sub-Districts already organized in any District shall contribute and become a part of the same and comply with its laws, before they are entitled to pass-word or representation in either International or District organization.

" 'ARTICLE XIV.

" 'Section 1. Local Unions shall be composed of miners, mine laborers and other workmen, skilled and unskilled, working in and about the mines, except mine manager, top boss and persons engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquors, and shall be given such numbers as the International Secretary-Treasurer may assign them.

" 'Sec. 2. All Locals shall be under the jurisdiction of the International, District, and Sub-District Unions, and may make such laws for their government as they deem necessary, provided they do not conflict with the International, District, and Sub-District Constitutions or agreements entered into. Any Local Union or members thereof violating this section shall be subject to a fine of not less than $5.00.'

"And to further show how this Union undertakes to control the freedom of its members to work when and for whom they please, also its determination to destroy the right of the employer to conduct his own business as he pleases and to discharge and employ whom he pleases, I quote these sections of Article X of this Constitution:

"'Section 1. When trouble of a local character arises between members of a Local Union and their employers, the officers of said Local shall endeavor to effect an amicable adjustment, and failing in this they shall immediately notify the officers of the District to which the affected Locals are attached, and said District officers shall immediately investigate the cause of complaint; and failing to effect a peaceable settlement on a basis that would be fair and just to aggrieved members, finding that a strike would best serve the interests of the locality affected, they may order the inauguration of a strike, but no local strike shall be legalized or supported by a District unless its inauguration was approved by the officers of the District or by the International Executive Board, upon an appeal taken by the aggrieved members from the decision of the District officers; any Local Union striking in violation of the above provisions shall not be sustained or recognized by the International officers.

"'Sec. 3. When any member of the United Mine Workers is suspended or discharged, it shall be the duty of the Mine Committee to immediately investigate the case, and if the member discharged is not guilty of an offense justifying the same, the grievance shall immediately be reported to the Sub-District and District President in writing, under the seal of the Local, and, if, upon investigation, the report of the Local Committee is found correct, the Sub-District and District President shall immediately insist upon the reinstatement of the suspended or discharged member.

"'Sec. 4. The International officers shall, at any time they deem it to be the best interests of mine workers in a District that is idle, for just and sufficient reasons, order a suspension in any other District or Districts that would in any way impede the settlement of the District affected; provided, that such action would conserve to the best interests of the United Mine Workers of America.'

"I also quote the following from the Constitution of District No. 6:

"'ARTICLE I.

"'Section 1. This organization shall be known as District No. 6 of the United Mine Workers of America.

"'Sec. 2. One of the objects of this organization is to unite all employees in and around the coal mines of Ohio and the Panhandle District of West Virginia.

"'ARTICLE VIII.

"'Section 1. In case of trouble arising in any local with the employer, it shall be the duty of the local officers to try to effect a settlement; failing in this the grievance shall be presented to the sub-district President in writing, who shall investigate the grievance or dispute and settle, if possible. Should he fail, he shall consult the District President, who shall settle the dispute either by suspending work or such other methods as they may deem best. In case of a direct violation of agreements the sub-district President or Local Union affected are authorized to order a suspension of work.

"'Sec. 2. When it becomes necessary for the District President to close a mine, or when a mine or mines from some other legitimate cause has been forced to close down, said officers may, if they deem it wise, close every other mine in district, or may distribute those idle men into any other mine or mines in the district in which said mine or mines so closed may be situated.

"'ARTICLE IX.

"'Section 1. The initiation fee in District 6 shall be $10.00, and all persons applying for and securing work in the mines who are not practical workers shall pay $10.00 initiation fee. Any person applying for work at any organized mine shall present a United Mine Workers' card. In case said person cannot present such a union card he shall pay the regular initiation fee.

" 'Sec. 6. All persons employed as check-weighmen shall be members of the United Mine Workers for a period of six months before they are elected to such position. Notice shall be posted near the weigh sheet at least three days before the election of a check-weighman, and no persons are entitled to vote except those who are assessed to pay him his wages.

" 'Sec. 12. When a miner's son becomes old enough to work in mine he shall be given the preference over other applicants for work.

" 'Sec. 15. Any member of our organization working in or around the mine, working on idle days or extra time, in violation of our Constitution or agreements, shall be fined $2.50 for each offense.

" 'Sec. 17. That a fine of $10.00 in each individual case where it can be proven that a member of the Union leaves his district for West Virginia, or any other unfair mines, and remains there one month or more without having deposited his transfer card and returns without giving a satisfactory account of why he has not deposited his transfer card; and the fine to be collected by the Local Union where he works.'

"And these from the Constitution of Sub-District 5 of District 6:

" 'ARTICLE I.

" 'Section 1. This organization shall be known as Sub-District 5 of District 6, United Mine Workers of America.

" 'Sec. 2. The object of this organization is to unite the mine employees of Belmont, Jefferson, Tuscarawas, Harrison, and Carroll counties in Ohio, and that part of Stark County south of Canton, other than the Massillon Seam, and Hancock, Brooke, Ohio, and Marshall counties of West Virginia, to ameliorate their conditions by methods of conciliation, arbitration, or strike.

"'Sec. 3. All men are eligible and must be members of the U. M. W. of A. who work in and around the mines.

"'ARTICLE IX.

"'Sec. 2. That a fine of $10.00 in each case, where it can be proven that a member of our Union leaves his district for West Virginia or any other unfair mine, and remains one month or more without depositing a transfer card, and returns without giving a satisfactory account of why he has not deposited his transfer card, and a fine to be collected by the Local Union where he is working.

"'Sec. 3. Any member of our organization working in or around the mine, working on idle days or extra time, in violation of our Constitution or agreements, shall be fined $2.50 for each offense.'

"It very clearly appears from a study of these rules that (a) they undertake to require members of the organization to surrender their individual freedom of action; (b) to coerce non-union miners to join the union, whether wishing to do so or not for they must be members 'who work in and around the mines;' (c) to control or rather abrogate and destroy the right of the employer to contract with the men independent of the organization; (d) to exclude his right to employ non-union labor if he desires; (e) to limit his right, in the absence of contract, to discharge whom he pleases, when he pleases, and for what reason he sees fit, and (f) to assume the right on the part of the organization, through its officers to control the employer's business, to shut down his mine by calling out the men in obedience to their obligation, whenever it is deemed to the interests of the Union regardless of the employer's interests or the effect that such action may have upon him, as regards loss, damage and necessary violations, on account thereof, of his existing contracts with others. To such extent in this direction does such assumption of power and control go, that it is directly provided that such suspension of operations may be ordered, even though there be no dispute between the employer and the Union, but solely because such dispute exists between the Union and some one or more of his rival operators in business in the same district. In all these particulars these provisions violate the law guaranteeing, under our free government, the rights of both the labor and capital involved and, further, the rights of the public consuming the product of such labor and capital. But still further and what manifestly is of far more vital importance, under the power so assumed by this close and compact organization, and by reason of these obligations and rules enforced by it upon its members, it is more than probable, that if allowed to unionize and control the mining operations in West Virginia, it will be entirely able to fulfill its express contract of 1898 with its co-conspirators, the operators of Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Indiana and Illinois and 'protect' them from the competition of West Virginia coals, restore to them their lost markets and practically destroy the coal mining industry of this State to accomplish which, the Union has admittedly already spent hundreds of thousands of dollars and sacrificed human life, as yet to no avail. It is not to be assumed that because I have not discussed other of the rules and purposes of this organization that I have ignored their meritorious and beneficent character; nor that I have not considered the very natural and human instinct inspiring the officers and members of this Union, resident in other States and laboring under physical disadvantage in mining conditions, to regard their personal interests as paramount. Most of its officers have testified in open court before me and have fully convinced me that they are men sincere in the conviction of the integrity of their action, perfectly frank and truthful in their testimony, self educated and who have by their own effort rightly acquired the leadership in their life work. So far as I am concerned the law requires me to consider these rules of the organization and ascertain whether any of them are unlawful in character. If so, whether the unlawful ones dominate the actions and purposes of the organization, or whether the purposes contemplated by the unlawful ones are so intermingled with those designed by the lawful ones as to render separation impracticable. If such domination of the unlawful prevails or such separation cannot be made then under the authorities I have cited the organization becomes unlawful. In view of the undisputed testimony in this case I am constrained to believe both unlawful conditions exist as to these rules. They go far beyond those held to be unlawful, dominating and inseparable by the English cases which I have cited. They have permitted the officers of this organization to expend, by their own admission, hundreds of thousands of dollars of the funds derived from members bound by these rules, in an unlawful conspiracy to restrain trade upon such a large scale as to involve the whole vast coal mining industry of West Virginia."

DECISION OF DISTRICT COURT IN HITCHMAN CASE.

We quote from Judge Dayton's opinion, Record, p. 691, beginning with the first line,

> "I conclude, therefore, that this organization, known as the United Mine Workers of America, is an unlawful one because, (a) of its principles as set forth in its constitutions, obligation for membership and rules, which (1) require its members to surrender their individual freedom of action; (2) seeks to require, in practical effect, all mine workers to become members of it whether desirous of doing so or not; (3) seeks to control, and restrict, if not destroy, the right of the mine owner to contract with its employees independent of the organization; (4) to exclude his right to employ non-union labor if he desires; (5) to limit his right to discharge, in the absence of contract, whom he pleases, when he pleases and for any cause or reason that to him seems proper; (6) assumes the right on its part, by and through its officers, to control the mine owner's business by shutting down his mine, calling out his men upon indefinite strike in obedience to their obligation to the Union, whether the men desire to quit work or not, whenever the Union's officers deem it to be for the best interests of the Union, regardless of the rights and interests of the mine owner, and regardless of his direct loss and damages and such indirect loss and damage as may be incurred by him by reason of the resultant violation of contracts by him with others. Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, 52 L. ed. 436. I further conclude that it is an unlawful organization because, (b) of its procedure and practices in that (1) it seeks to create a monopoly of mine labor such as to enable it, as an organization, to control the coal mining business of the country, and (2) has by express contract joined in a combination and conspiracy with a body of rival operators, resident in other States, to control, restrain, and, to an extent at least, destroy the coal trade of the State of West Virginia. It has spent fourteen years' time and hundreds of thousands of dollars in effort to accomplish this unlawful purpose."

Record, p. 691, l. 1–31.

And further from Record, p. 693, beginning with line 36.

"I further conclude that this Union, in pursuit of its unlawful purposes to secure control and the monopoly of mine labor, and to restrain, suppress, if not destroy, the coal-mining industry of West Virginia in the interest of their co-conspirators, rival operators and producers in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Illinois and Indiana competitive fields, have sought and still seek to compel the plaintiff, the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, to submit to contractual relations with it as an organization, relating to the employment of labor and production contrary to the will and wish of said company; that its officers, in pursuance of such unlawful effort to monopolize labor and restrain trade, and with knowledge of the express contracts existing between this plaintiff and its employees, have unlawfully sought to cause the breach of the said contracts on the part of its said employees. It is admitted in the testimony of Lewis, Sullivan and Savage that, if this injunction is dissolved, such efforts will be repeated."

Record, p. 693, l. 36–51.

And further from Record, p. 694, beginning with line 1,

"It therefore necessarily follows that the plaintiff had by reason of the damage and loss it had already incurred and the damage and loss threatened and imminent to it in futuro, just right to appeal to this court of equity for injunctive relief; that by reason of its unlawful organization, purposes and practices, as hereinbefore set forth, this organization, combination or Union, as now constituted, is unlawful and under the law, therefore, has no right to seek plaintiff's employees to become members thereof or to become party to its unlawful purposes and practices.

"The injunction will be made perpetual."

Record, p. 694, l. 1–10.

DECISION OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS.

Upon exactly the same evidence the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed Judge Dayton upon every point and dismissed plaintiff's bill as without merit.

SPECIFICATION OF ERRORS IN THE DECREE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS.

Reversing Judge Dayton's decision upon every point, dissolving the injunction, and dismissing plaintiff's bill.

ARGUMENT.

THE PLAINTIFF'S CONTENTION IN THIS CASE BEFORE THIS COURT IS STATED UNDER THREE HEADS:

1. Chicago Agreement of 1898 and the efforts of defendants to carry it out.

(a) By the Chicago Agreement of 1898 the defendants conspired with Union operators, competitors of West Virginia operators and of operators of other States, to substantially restrain or suppress coal mining in West Virginia, and in the fulfillment of that contract caused the plaintiff to suffer loss and damage by reason of the unionizing of its mine April 1, 1903, and by reason of its operations under coerced contracts with the Union to June 12, 1906, whereby in operating time the plaintiff lost 164 days and $48,742 in money.

(b) Through the adoption of Resolution No. 8 by the 1907 Convention of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6 of the United Mine Workers of America the defendants caused loss and damage to the plaintiff by reason of its inability, owing to organizing efforts, to fulfill its contracts for lake coal in the summer and fall of 1907, and are about to cause the plaintiff to suffer incalculable loss and damage by reason of their announced intention to proceed again to unionize the Hitchman mine, if the injunction now forbidding it were out of the way.

(c) Through induced breaches of contracts, existing between the plaintiff and its employees, known to the defendants, and with which they have no concern, defendants have caused plaintiff to suffer great loss and damage through its inability to comply with its contracts for lake coal during the summer and fall of 1907, and are about to cause plaintiff to suffer incalculable loss and damage through their efforts to unionize plaintiff's mine, which they propose to again attempt, providing the injunction now restraining them can be gotten out of the way.

2. The United Mine Workers are an oppressive monopoly and seek absolute control of all labor in the coal mining industry.

(a) Owing to this purpose the United Mine Workers entered into the Chicago Agreement of 1898.

(b) In pursuit of the same purpose they passed Resolution No. 8 at the 1907 Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6.

(c) And likewise they undertook to induce breaches of contracts of employment between plaintiff and plaintiff's employees, which were known to them, and with which they had no concern, and they propose to continue to breach these contracts until plaintiff shall submit to them and unionize its mine, provided the injunction now preventing that course of action on their part can be gotten rid of.

3. If the effort of the United Mine Workers to get all men working in and about each mine to join their Union is lawful, still they may not exercise that right in such a way as will be inconsistent with, or as will destroy the constitutional right, of equal dignity, of the employer, and in this case the right of the Hitchman Company, to contract with its employees upon such terms as may be agreed upon between it and its employees. Neither may they make use of their right to organize in such a manner as will be inconsistent with, or as will interfere with or destroy such contracts between the employer and employee, and in this case between the Hitchman Company and its employees, with which contracts the defendants have no concern.

> "Society itself is an organization, and does not object to organizations for social, religious, business, and all legal purposes. The law, therefore, recognizes the right of workingmen to unite and to invite others to join their ranks, thereby making available the strength, influence, and power that come from such association. By virtue of this right, powerful labor unions have been organized.
> "But the very fact that it is lawful to form these bodies with multitudes of members, means that they have thereby acquired a vast power, in the presence of which the individual may be helpless. This power, when unlawfully used against one, cannot be met, except by his purchasing peace at the cost of submitting to terms which involve the sacrifice of rights protected by the Constitution; or by standing on such rights, and appealing to the preventive powers of a court of equity. When such appeal is made, it is the duty of government to protect the one against the many, as well as the many against the one."

ERRORS IN THE DECREE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS.

First.

As to the Organization, the Circuit Court of Appeals says:

> "A consideration of the purposes of this organization as set forth in its constitution impels us to the conclusion that there is nothing contained therein to justify the contention that its purposes are unlawful."

(d) Labor unions may be unlawful.

In the case of Coppage v. Kansas, decided January 25, 1915, 236 U. S. 1, this Court said:

> "Of course we do not intend to say, nor to intimate, anything inconsistent with the right of individuals to join labor unions, nor do we question the legitimacy of such organizations so long as they conform to the laws of the land as others are required to do."

But even as to this, the Court added this significant qualification:

> "And we have no reference to questions of monopoly, or interference with the rights of third parties or the general public. These involve other considerations, respecting which we intend to intimate no opinion. See Curran v. Galen, 152 N. Y. 33, 37 L. R. A. 802, 57 Am. St. Rep. 496; 46 N. E. 297; Jacobs v. Cohen, 183 N. Y. 207, 213, 214; 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 292; 111 Am. St. Rep. 730; 76 N. E. 5; 5 Ann. The cases referred to in this last quotation from Coppage v. Kansas hold, as follows:

"An agreement between a labor association and an employers' association, that all employees of the members of the latter association shall be members of the former association, and that no employee shall work for a longer period than four weeks without becoming a member, is illegal and constitutes no defense to an action for conspiracy by an employee who is discharged in pursuance of such agreement because of his refusal to become a member of the labor association."

Curran v. Galen (1897), 152 N. Y. 33; 37 L. R. A. 802.

"A contract by a manufacturer to employ as laborers none but members of a particular labor union is not void as against public policy."

Jacobs v. Cohen (1905), 183 N. Y. 207; 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 292.

"Members of a labor union are entitled to an injunction restraining the members of another union from which they have withdrawn from doing acts in pursuance of a conspiracy to compel their reinstatement, by appeals to their employers to induce them to rejoin and to discharge them in case of refusal, accompanied by threats intimating results detrimental to the employer's business and property in case of a failure to comply, coercive in effect upon the will, although they committed no acts of personal violence or physical injury to property, where complainants have been injured by such acts, and there is reason to believe that further proceedings of the same kind are contemplated which will result in still more injury to them."

"A contract between an employer and a labor union obligating the employer to retain in his employ no one objectionable to the union for any cause does not of itself justify interference with a workman's employment by the one who secured the contract on behalf of the union.

"Whether or not interference with a laborer's employment under a contract between a labor union and an employer, obligating the employer to retain no one in his employ who was objectionable to the union, was for a justifiable cause, is a question for the jury.

"Interference by a combination of persons to obtain the discharge of a workman because he refuses to comply with their wishes and join a union for their advantage cannot be justified as a part of the competition of workmen with one another.

"The purpose of strengthening itself in future contests with the employer will not justify a labor union in interfering with the contracts of non-union workmen for the purpose of compelling them to join the union.

"The attempt to force all laborers to combine in unions is against the policy of the law because aiming at monopoly.

"The right of a laborer to recover damages for wrongful interference with his contract of employment is not affected by the fact that it was terminable at will, instead of ending at a stated time."

Berry v. Donovan (1905), 188 Mass. 353; 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899.

"Plaintiff was a member of a trade union (a voluntary association), whose rules provided for fining and otherwise punishing any member violating the laws of the association or the rules of trade. The rules provided for a trial of the accused member before a tribunal established within the association, at the same time providing that he should be entitled to 'due notice and a fair trial,' and should not be put on trial unless charges were submitted in writing by a member of the association. Plaintiff, having been put on trial without the submission of written charges and without due notice, was sentenced to pay a fine and to give up his place of employment for one year. Held, that this course of procedure, unless consented to by plaintiff, furnished no justification for the subsequent action of the association and its officers in procuring his discharge from employment.

"Whether plaintiff did consent to be put on trial without charges or notice was, under the evidence in this case, a question for the jury.

"*The Constitution of this State (article 1, par. 1) establishes the inalienable right of all men to acquire property and pursue and obtain safety and happiness. Included in this is the right of making contracts for personal service as a means of acquiring property. "Whoever intentionally and without legal justification or excuse procures an employer to discharge his employee, to the damage of the latter, is liable to an action for damages at the suit of the employee; and this, although there was no binding contract of employment.

Second.

Upon the subject of the Chicago Agreement of 1898, the Circuit Court of Appeals says:

> "A fair interpretation of the evidence shows that it was the purpose of the defendants to induce the miners of West Virginia to become members of the organization, and thereby secure as high wages as possible, compatible with the successful operation of the mines of that State by the respective owners. They had a perfect right to form a combination to accomplish such purposes by peaceable and lawful methods, and so long as they refrained from resorting to unlawful measures to effectuate the same they could not be said to be engaged in a conspiracy to unionize plaintiff's mine.
> "As we have already stated, the evidence fails to show that any unlawful methods were resorted to by these defendants in this instance. Therefore, the court erred in holding the organization to be unlawful upon the theory that it was guilty of a conspiracy."

IN REACHING THIS CONCLUSION, THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS ERRED AGAIN, IN THE LIGHT OF THE FACTS, AND IN THE LAW APPLICABLE THERETO.

The Chicago Agreement of 1898 turned out in practice to be what it was intended to be when made. It was an oppressive combination entered into between the United Mine Workers organization and the Union operators of the Central Competitive States, for a consideration passing between them, whereby the United Mine Workers were to unionize the State of West Virginia, for the purpose of substantially restraining or suppressing coal mining in West Virginia, to the end that the competition, theretofore existing between the non-union operators of West Virginia and the Union operators, the other parties to the Chicago Agreement of 1898, might be brought to an end.

That continuous efforts were made by the United Mine Workers' organization to carry out its part of the Chicago Agreement, and to unionize all the mines of West Virginia, is admitted by William Green, one of the defendants, now Secretary-Treasurer of the National Organization, in a statement made by him in the 1910 Joint Convention of the United Mine Workers and Union Operators of the Central Competitive States.

We quote Mr. Green's language as it appears on page 668 of the Record, beginning with line 12:

> "Let me point to the fact that the United Mine Workers of America have diligently and aggressively attempted to carry out the promise made in Chicago in 1898; that they have done everything in their power to redeem any promise they may have made to organize West Virginia. Since 1898 our organization has at various times spent hundreds of thousands of dollars trying to unionize West Virginia. We have also sacrificed human life in the attempt to redeem that promise. In view of the fact that we have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars and that our organizers, our members who have gone there as missionaries in an attempt to redeem that promise have sacrificed their lives and their liberties, we should be given credit for what we have done. I want to ask the operators how much money they have spent and what they have done to aid us to organize West Virginia."
> Record, p. 668, l. 12–25.

Third.

As to Resolution No. 8 the Circuit Court of Appeals is silent.

We quote from Record, page 742, beginning with line 39:

> "While it is not denied by the defendants that they sought by peaceable methods to induce those employed by the plaintiff to join the union, yet they stoutly contend that at no time since the mine has been operated as a non-union mine have they employed unlawful methods. We fail to find that there is sufficient legal evidence to show that the defendants entered into a conspiracy or combination for the purpose of unionizing the plaintiff's mine. While there was evidence admitted by the Court below as to statements made by certain officials of the United Mine Workers of America, and the coal operators of Pennsylvania and other States, bearing upon this question, yet there is no evidence to show that the United Mine Workers of America combined, or formed themselves into a conspiracy for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mines after it started to run its mine non-union in June, 1906."
> Record, p. 742, l. 39–50.
> Record, p. 743, l. 1, 2.

IN REACHING THIS CONCLUSION THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS ERRED AGAIN IN THE LIGHT OF THE FACTS AND IN THE LAW APPLICABLE THERETO.

We quote from the report of the Secretary-Treasurer, Lee Rankin, one of the defendants, in his report to the 1907 Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6:

> "We have one mine at Bellaire, Ohio, and five mines in the Pan Handle District which I believe should be organized. I believe those mines can be organized and in my opinion this convention should adopt some plan to organize those mines."

Report of Secretary-Treasurer Lee Rankin, p. 10, l. 34–38.

(Original document transmitted to U. S. Supreme Court.)

Record, p. 414, l. 21–30.

"RESOLUTION NO. 8.

"Whereas, there are mines in the Panhandle District and Ohio that are not organized, and believing every mine should be organized; be it

"Resolved, by this ninth annual convention that the sub-district officers together with the district officers be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the sub-district as quickly as it can be done."

Record, p. 414, l. 35–42.

Fourth.

In holding that the defendants have a lawful right to induce plaintiff's employees to join their Union, provided that in inducing them to join they do not use coercion, threats, intimidation or violence for the purpose, the Circuit Court of Appeals for one ground says:

> "If the plaintiff may for the purpose of protecting its interests adopt a policy by which only non-union men can secure employment at its mines, and such conduct be sanctioned by the law, by what process of reasoning can it be held that the defendants may not adopt the same method in order to protect their interests?"
> Record, p. 731, l. 21–26.

IN REACHING THIS CONCLUSION, THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS ERRED AGAIN IN THE LIGHT OF THE FACTS AND IN THE LAW APPLICABLE THERETO.

The plaintiff has a right to protect itself against the United Mine Workers by refusing to employ or to keep in its employ any member of that Union.

That is a reasonable rule which the plaintiff finds necessary for the protection of its business.

In Howard v. Danner, the signed agreement was for the purpose of protecting that plaintiff against a competitor. Danner had been in the employ of the plaintiff, and in breach of a contract he had made with the plaintiff, was then working for plaintiff's competitor. The agreement, which he broke, read as follows:

> "In consideration of your retaining my services as waiter at 4s. per week under the new management, with a week's notice on either side, I hereby agree that in case I should leave your service or be dismissed, I will not, during the year 1901, enter into the service of the new restaurant shortly to be opened at 62, Regent Street, and I further agree to pay for any breach of this agreement the sum of one pound for every day I may remain in the service of the new restaurant, as liquidated damages."
> "A labor organization seeking to compel a manufacturer to unionize his plant is not such a competitor in the labor market as to justify it in enticing employes to leave the service of their master, or to induce persons seeking employment with him from so doing, when the enticer does not employ labor. The competition which the law upholds must be honest competition, and not a malicious attempt to injure another."
>

It is not to the point to say that the United Mine Workers have absorbed all other labor organizations for the mining of coal.

Record, p. 542, l. 13–44.

Nor that it is the largest labor organization in the world.

Record, p. 569, l. 40–43.

Nor that it aims to organize every mine on the American Continent.

Record, p. 569, l. 48–52.
Record, pp. 570, 571, l. 1–15.
Record, p. 619, l. 12–14.

"The attempt to force all laborers to combine in unions is against the policy of the law because aiming at monopoly."

THEREFORE—

THE FACT THAT THE UNITED MINE WORKERS HAVE MADE THEMSELVES AN EXCLUSIVE, AGGRESSIVE AND POWERFUL MONOPOLY CANNOT BE TURNED INTO A SHIELD TO PROTECT THEM. WRONGDOERS CANNOT PROFIT BY THEIR OWN WRONGS.

Fifth.

In holding that the defendants have a lawful right to induce plaintiff's employees to join their union provided that in inducing them to join they do not use coercion, threats, intimidation or violence for the purpose, the Circuit Court of Appeals for another ground, says:

> "While it is true that the plaintiff has a perfect right to refuse to employ union labor, is it not equally true that union labor, as we have stated, may by the employment of legitimate means, do that which is necessary to keep its forces together?
> "Surely we have not reached the point when capital with its strong arm may adopt a plan like this for protecting its interests, while on the other hand the laboring classes are to be denied the protection of the law when they are attempting to assert rights that are just as important to their well-being as are the rights of those who have been more fortunate in accumulating wealth. He who 'seeks equity must do equity.'

In other words he 'must come into court with clean hands.' If the courts of this country should by injunctive relief protect the mine owner in the enjoyment of his property rights, and restrain the laboring people from organizing their forces by declaring such organization unlawful, would not the mine owner then be in a position to control the situation so that he who has to toil for his daily bread would be placed in a position where if he exists at all, he must do so at such wages, and upon such terms as organized capital may see fit to dictate."

Record, p. 731, l. 48–51.
Record, p. 732, l. 1–15.

IN REACHING THIS CONCLUSION THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS ERRED AGAIN, IN THE LIGHT OF THE FACTS, AND IN THE LAW APPLICABLE THERETO.

The injunction in the Hitchman case does not restrain the laboring people from organizing their forces, but simply requires them in so doing to conform to the laws of the land as others are required to do.

Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1.

There is no strike and this is not a strike case.

The Hitchman Company has no dispute with its employees nor have they any dispute with it.

The Hitchman Company has no contractual or other business relations with the Union.

And there is no dispute between the Hitchman Company and the defendants, except what they themselves have intentionally brought about.

THIS DISPUTE, FORGED BY THEM AS A WEAPON TO STRIKE IN ILLEGITIMATE ATTACK, CANNOT BE TURNED INTO A SCREEN TO CONCEAL THE NATURE AND OBJECT OF THEIR COMBINATION.

Long v. Larkin, et als. (1914), 2 I. R. 285, 302, 303, 306.

In Adair v. United States, quoting from Mr. Cooley in his treatise on Torts, page 278, this Court says:

> "It is a part of every man's civil rights that he be left at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal rests upon reason, or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice or malice. With his reasons neither the public nor third persons have any legal concern. It is also his right to have business relations with anyone with whom he can make contracts, and, if he is wrongfully deprived of this right by others, he is entitled to redress."
> 208 U. S. 161–192 at p. 173; 52 L. Ed. 436–450, p. 442.

And again in reaffirming the Adair case, this Court says:

> "The constitutional right of the employer to discharge an employee because of his membership in a labor union being granted, can the employer be compelled to resort to this extreme measure? May he not offer to the employee an option, such as was offered in the instant case, to remain in the employment if he will retire from the union; to sever the former relationship only if he prefers the latter? Granted the equal freedom of both parties to the contract of employment, has not each party the right to stipulate upon what terms only he will consent to the inception, or to the continuance, of that relationship? And may he not insist upon an express agreement, instead of leaving the terms of the employment to be implied? Can the legislature in effect require either party at the beginning to act covertly; concealing essential terms of the employment—terms to which, perhaps, the other would not willingly consent —and revealing them only when it is proposed to insist upon them as a ground for terminating the relationship? Supposing an employer is unwilling to have in his employ one holding membership in a labor union, and has reason to suppose that the man may prefer membership in the union to the given employment without it—we ask, can the legislature oblige the employer in such case to refrain from dealing frankly at the outset? And is not the employer entitled to insist upon equal frankness in return? Approaching the matter from a somewhat different standpoint, is the employee's right to be free to join a labor union any more sacred, or more securely founded upon the Constitution, than his right to work for whom he will, or to be idle if he will? And does not the ordinary contract of employment include an insistence by the employer that the employee shall agree, as a condition of the employment, that he will not be idle and will not work for whom he pleases, but will serve his present employer, and him only, so long as the relation between them shall continue? Can the right of making contracts be enjoyed at all, except by parties coming together in an agreement that requires each party to forego, during the time and for the purpose covered by the agreement, any inconsistent exercise of his constitutional rights?

"These queries answer themselves. The answers, as we think, lead to a single conclusion: Under constitutional freedom of contract, whatever either party has the right to treat as sufficient ground for terminating the employment, where there is no stipulation on the subject, he has the right to provide against by insisting that a stipulation respecting it shall be a sine qua non of the inception of the employment, or of its continuance if it be terminable at will."

Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, at page —.

Sixth.

In holding that the defendants have a lawful right to induce plaintiff's employees to join their Union, regardless of their contract with the plaintiff not to do so, provided that in inducing them to join defendants do not use coercion, threats, intimidation or violence for the purpose, the Circuit Court of Appeals says:

"The contract in question is in the following language:

"'I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employee of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company; that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said Company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company that I will not make any effort amongst its employees to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard the same read.'

"It will be observed that by the terms of the contract that either of the parties thereto may at will terminate the same, and while it is provided that so long as the employee continues to work for the plaintiff he shall not join this organization, nevertheless, there is nothing in the contract which requires such employees to work for any fixed or definite period. If at any time after employment any of them should decide to join the defendant organization, the plaintiff could not under the contract recover damages for a breach of the same. In other words, the employees under this contract may, if they deem proper, at any moment join a labor union, and the only penalty provided therefor is that they cannot secure further employment from the plaintiff. Therefore, under this contract, if the non-union men, or any of them, should see fit to join the United Mine Workers of America on account of lawful and persuasive methods on the part of the defendants, and as a result of such action on their part were to be discharged by the plaintiff, it could not maintain an action against them on account of such conduct on their part. Such being the case it would be unreasonable to hold that the action of the defendants would render the United Mine Workers of America liable in damages to the plaintiff because they had employed lawful methods to induce the non-union miners to become members of their organization.

"Under these circumstances we fail to see how this contract can be taken as a basis for restraining the defendants from using lawful methods for the purpose of inducing the parties to the contract to join the organization."

Record, p. 744, l. 35–50.
Record, p. 745, l. 1–26.

IN REACHING THIS CONCLUSION THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS ERRED, AGAIN, IN THE LIGHT OF THE FACTS, AND IN THE LAW APPLICABLE THERETO.

"When a man is called upon to agree not to become or remain a member of the Union while working for a particular employer, he is in effect only asked to deal openly and frankly with his employer, so as not to retain the employment upon terms to which the latter is not willing to agree. And the liberty of making contracts does not include a liberty to procure employment from an unwilling employer, or without a fair understanding. Nor may the employer be foreclosed by legislation from exercising the same freedom of choice that is the right of the employee.

"To ask a man to agree, in advance, to refrain from affiliation with the union while retaining a certain position of employment, is not to ask him to give up any part of his constitutional freedom. He is free to decline the employment on those terms, just as the employer may decline to offer employment on any other; for 'it takes two to make a bargain.' Having accepted employment on those terms, the man is still free to join the union when the period of employment expires; or, if employed at will, then at any time upon simply quitting the employment. And, if bound by his own agreement to refrain from joining during a stated period of employment, he is in no different situation from that which is necessarily incident to term contracts in general. For constitutional freedom of contract does not mean that a party is to be as free after making a contract as before; he is not free to break it without accountability. Freedom of contract, from the very nature of the thing, can be enjoyed only by being exercised; and each particular exercise of it involves making an engagement which, if fulfilled, prevents for the time any inconsistent course of conduct."

Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1 at page —.

EMPLOYMENT AT THE WILL OF THE PARTIES DOES NOT MAKE IT EMPLOYMENT AT THE WILL OF OTHERS.

"It is said that the bill does not show an employment for a term, and that under an employment at will the complainant could be discharged at any time for any reason or for no reason, the motive of the employer being immaterial. The conclusion, however, that is sought to be drawn is too broad. The fact that the employment is at the will of the parties respectively, does not make it one at the will of others. The employee has manifest interest in the freedom of the employer to exercise his judgment without illegal interference or compulsion and, by the weight of authority the unjustified interference of third persons is actionable although the employment is at will. Moran v. Dunphy, 177 Mass. 485, 487; Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353; Brennan v. United Hatters, 73 N. J. Law, 729, 743; Perkins v. Pendleton, 90 Me. 166; Lucke v. Clothing Cutters' & T. Assembly, 77 Md. 396; London Guar. & Acc. Co. v. Horn, 101 Ill. App. 355, 206 Ill. 493; Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 300; Blumenthal v. Shaw, 23 C. C. A. 290, 77 Fed. 954."

Truax, Sr., et al. v. Raich, No. 361, Oct. Term, 1915. —— U. S. p. ——.

"'Every person has a right under the law, as between himself and his fellow subjects, to full freedom in disposing of his own labor or his own capital, according to his own will. It follows that every person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right, which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others.'

"But it is equally true that the members of trade unions are bound to respect the right of other workmen to work for whom they please, on what terms and at what times they please, so long as they do nothing illegal, and are also bound to respect the right of an employer to undertake any work he pleases to undertake, and to employ what workmen he chooses, on whatever terms they both agree to, unless there is something unlawful in his action. If, therefore, any two or more members of a trade union, whatever its rules may be, wilfully and knowingly combine to injure an employer by inducing his workmen to break their contracts with him, or not to enter into contracts with him, resulting in damage to him, that is an entirely different matter. That is an invasion of the liberty of action of others, and has no analogy to the action of the defendant in the Mogul Case (1); for there, as Lord Halsbury pointed out in Quinn v. Leathem (2), no legal right had been interfered with, no coercion of mind or will had been effected, all were left free to trade on what terms they willed, and nothing was done except in rival trading which could be supposed to interfere with the appellant's interest.

"The fact that members of a trade union are merely acting in obedience to a rule of their union, believed by them to be for their benefit, is no defense to an action for the breach of any contracts they have entered into, Read v. Friendly Society of Operative Stonemasons (3); and still less is it a defense to the wilful and malicious infringement in combination of that legal right of personal freedom of action which they claim for themselves, but which others are entitled to quite as fully and as absolutely as they are."

Larkin, et al. v. Long [1915] A. C. 814–846, at pp. 829, 830. H. L. (I).

THERE WAS NO DUTY OF ANY KIND ON THE DEFENDANTS TO COMMIT THE ACTS CHARGED AGAINST THEM, AND IN THIS ABSENCE OF DUTY OF SOME KIND IT IS DIFFICULT TO SEE HOW JUSTIFICATION IS POSSIBLE. THE HIGHEST POINT TO WHICH THE ARGUMENT CAN BE CARRIED IN FAVOR OF THE DEFENDANTS IS THAT THE DEFENDANTS ACTED WITHOUT SINISTER MOTIVES IN THE SUPPOSED INTERESTS OF THE MEN AND WITHOUT ILL WILL TO THE PLAINTIFF, BUT THESE ARE CONSIDERATIONS WHICH DO NOT ALTER THE WRONGFUL NATURE OF THE ACTS CHARGED AGAINST THESE DEFENDANTS, AND CANNOT BE SUCCESSFULLY URGED AS AN EXCUSE OR JUSTIFICATION.

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1915.

No. 241.

HITCHMAN COAL AND COKE COMPANY, a Corporation, Appellant,

v.

Appeal from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, and Upon a Petition for a Writ of Certiorari to the said Court.

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF OF GEORGE R. E. GILCHRIST AND HANNIS TAYLOR FOR THE HITCHMAN COAL AND COKE COMPANY, APPELLANT AND PETITIONER.

In view of the fact that appellees have filed a "Notice of motion to dismiss the appeal in the above-entitled cause, No. 241, and brief in support of said motion," in which brief the contention is made that the jurisdiction of the primary court "was invoked by you on the ground of diverse citizenship, and upon no other ground whatsoever," counsel for appellant will, for the convenience of the court, file the following as a supplement to the last brief filed for appellant and petitioner in No. 241.

I.

The following memorandum brief was presented to Mr. Justice Pritchard in support of the petition for an appeal.

"UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS.

Fourth Circuit.

No. 1220.

JOHN MITCHELL, individually; T. L. LEWIS, individually; W. B. WILSON, individually, et al., Appellants

v.

HITCHMAN COAL AND COKE COMPANY, a Corporation, Appellee.

PETITION FOR APPEAL PRESENTED TO MR. JUSTICE PRITCHARD IN VACATION.

MEMORANDUM BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF SAID PETITION.

Pt. §6, Act March 3, 1891, Comp. St., 1901, p. 550.

"In all cases * * * not hereinbefore made final, there shall be of right an appeal or writ of error or review of the case by the Supreme Court of the United States where the matter in controversy shall exceed one thousand dollars besides costs. But no such appeal shall be taken or writ of error sued out unless within one year after the entry of the order, judgment, or decree sought to be reviewed."

WHEN ACTION OF CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS NOT FINAL.

"Judgment of the circuit court of appeals can not be held final on the ground that the jurisdiction of the circuit court was dependent entirely upon diverse citizenship, where the plaintiff's declaration claimed that the controversy turned on a construction of the laws of the United States and both courts below dealt with the case on that assumption."

Fla. Cent. &. P. R. Co. v. Bell, 176 U. S. 321.

"An appeal from a circuit court of appeals to the Federal Supreme Court will not be dismissed on the ground that the jurisdiction of the circuit court was invoked solely on the ground of diverse citizenship, where grounds of suit and relief were also based upon Federal statutes which were necessary elements of the decision of the circuit court of appeals."

Henningsen v. U. S. Fidelity & G. Co., 208 U. S. 404.

"The issue of unfair competition must be regarded as open for consideration by the Federal Supreme Court, on an appeal from the circuit court of appeals, where there was both diversity of citizenship and the assertion of a valid trademark to give jurisdiction to the circuit court, in view of the statutory provision making the judgments of the circuit courts of appeal final only where the jurisdiction below depended entirely upon diversity of citizenship, or where the case arose under the patent revenue, criminal, or admiralty laws."

Standard Paint Co. v. Trinidad A. M. Co., 220 U. S. 446.

"Whether the jurisdiction of the Federal circuit court depended on diverse citizenship alone, within the meaning of the act of March 3, 1891, §6, making the decrees of the circuit courts of appeals final in such cases, or was vested on other grounds as well, must be determined from complainant's statement of his own cause of action as set forth in the bill, without regard to any questions that might have been brought into the suit by the answers or in the course of the subsequent proceedings."

Shulthis v. McDougal, 225 U. S. 561.

See to the same effect Northern P. R. Co. v. Soderberg, 188 U. S. 526; Penn. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Austin, 186 U. S. 685; Northern P. R. Co. v. Amato, 144 U. S. 465; Warner v. Searle & H. Co., 191 U. S. 195.

In Omaha E. L. & Power Co. v. Omaha, 230 U. S. 123, a case involving diverse citizenship, it was held that, in order to deprive the decree of the circuit court of appeals of finality, the bill must contain "a general statement that a constitutional right was being or about to be infringed;" that it must appear "either in terms or by necessary intendment, that the plaintiff was asserting a right, privilege, or immunity under the constitution;" or that the plaintiff was in some form "invoking its protection." Therefore, if a right is claimed by the plaintiff in his bill involving diverse citizenship, either under a Federal statute or under the Constitution of the United States, it is only necessary for it to appear, "either in terms or by necessary intendment" that such "a right, privilege, or immunity" is being asserted. That is in perfect accord with the rule laid down in Bridge Proprietors v. Hoboken Co., 1 Wall. 116, 142, in which it was held that "It would be a new rule of pleading, and altogether superfluous, to require a party to set out specially the provision of the Constitution of the United States, on which he relies for the action of the court in the protection of his rights. If the courts of this country, and especially this court, can be supposed to take judicial notice of anything without pleading it specially it is the Constitution of the United States."

Thus it appears that a decree of a circuit court of appeals can never be considered final in a case involving diverse citizenship, "where the plaintiff's declaration claimed that the controversy turned on a construction of the laws of the United States, and both courts below dealt with the case on that assumption." It is sufficient if it appears, "by necessary intendment, that the plaintiff was asserting a right, privilege, or immunity under the Constitution" or laws of the United States. Inherent in this case and from the beginning, and patent upon the face of the bill filed by the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, is the fact that the contractual and property rights sought to be protected by said bill depend upon the terms of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution, and upon the terms of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, 26 Stat. L. 209. The following allegations appear on pp. 32–33 of the printed bill [Printed Record, p. 31] of the complaint:

> "Your orator further says that unless enjoined by this Court, the said defendants acting individually and agreeing, confederating, combining and forming themselves into a conspiracy under the name of the United Mine Workers of America as aforesaid, will, in pursuance of their unlawful purposes and designs, by enticement, persuasion or coercion, in one form or the other, bring about the shutting down of your orator's mine and the ultimate destruction of its business, and will without the consent and against the will of your orator compel your orator to recognize said defendants and said associations in the further transaction of its legitimate business in mining and shipping coal, and will compel your orator to contract with its employees through the said defendants as officers of the said associations under such rules and regulations made and enforced by said associations and by said defendant officers as will enable the Union to dictate the persons whom your orator shall employ and those whom your orator shall discharge, the wages your orator shall pay, and further, will compel your orator to agree that each of its future employees as members of the said United Mine Workers of America shall owe and yield to said Union an allegiance which shall in all things be paramount to that which said employees would owe to your orator, and that they will thus take charge of, dictate the management of, and virtually control, your orator's business, and thereby perpetrate acts of oppression and wrong upon your orator which distinctly violate your orator's contractual common law, statutory and constitutional rights as a citizen of the State of West Virginia."

As a citizen of West Virginia the corporation in question is necessarily a citizen of the United States, and as such it is entitled to the full protection of its Constitution and laws. See Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall, 36. No one can then deny that in this case "the plaintiff's declaration claimed that the controversy turned on a construction of the laws of the United States, and both courts below dealt with the case on that assumption." Judge Dayton's opinion deals, from beginning to end, with the contractual and property rights of the corporation in question, as protected by the terms of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, and by the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. On p. 34 of his printed opinion [Printed Record, p. 783] he refers directly to the case of Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, with the observation that "In this latter case the Supreme Court holds such a provision 'to be an invasion of personal liberty, as well as of the right of property, guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States;' " and on p. 60 [Printed Record, p. 806] he says: "Such a combination is clearly a common law conspiracy, too far reaching to be reasonable, in restraint of trade, as well, in my judgment, a direct violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law." The Circuit Court of Appeals differed with Judge Dayton as to the construction of the Federal law, constitutional and statutory, involved in the case; and as to its application to the facts of this case. Who then will deny that the real merits of this case, as stated on the face of plaintiff's bill, have, from the beginning, depended upon the construction and application to the facts involved of the Constitution and Laws of the United States, and that "both the courts below dealt with the case on that assumption." It is therefore certain that the decree rendered by said Circuit Court of Appeals on May 28, 1914, was not final; and that the corporation in question has "of right" an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It is the province of that court to determine in the last resort whether or no a decree of a circuit court of appeals is final or not under §6 of the Act of March, 1891. That was settled in Kingman & Co., v Western Mfg. Co., 170 U. S. 677 where it was said: "In Aztec Mining Company v. Ripley, 151 U. S. 79, it was held, that this court had jurisdiction by appeal or writ of error to pass upon the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of Appeals in cases involving the question whether their judgments were made final by Section 6 of the Act of March 3, 1891." In view of that announcement the Circuit Court of Appeals should in every case, where there is any doubt, grant the appeal so that the Supreme Court may settle the question as to the finality of its decree. If the decree is final, the appellee has a simple and inexpensive remedy by motion to dismiss for the want of jurisdiction. All of which is respectfully submitted.

Attorneys for Appellant."

In Hull v. Burr, 234 U. S. 712, this court said:

> "There is a motion to dismiss the appeal, based upon the ground that the jurisdiction of the district court depended solely upon diversity of citizenship, and that therefore the decree of the circuit court of appeals is final, under § 128, Judicial Code (36 Stat. at L. 1133, chap. 231, U. S. Comp. Stat., Supp. 1911, p. 193). The motion must be granted unless the suit was one arising under the laws of the United States, within the meaning of the first subidivsion of § 24 of the Code. The rule is firmly established that a suit does not so arise unless it really and substantially involves a dispute or controversy respecting the validity, construction, or effect of some law of the United States, upon the determination of which the result depends. And this must appear not by mere inference, but by distinct averments according to the rules of good pleading; not that matters of law must be pleaded as such, but that the essential facts averred must show, not as a matter of mere inference or argument, but clearly and distinctly, that the suit arises under some Federal Law. Hanford v. Davies, 163 U. S. 273, 279, 41 L. ed. 157, 159, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1051; Mountain View Min. & Mill Co. v. McFadden, 180 U. S. 533, 535, 45 L. ed. 656, 657, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488; Defiance Water Co. v. Defiance, 191 U. S. 184, 191, 48 L. ed. 140, 143, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 63; Arbuckle v. Blackburn, 191 U. S. 405, 413, 48 L. ed. 239, 241, 24 Sup. Ct. S. 561, 569, 56 L. ed. 1205, 1210, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 704."

In Mallinckrodt Chemical Works v. Missouri, 238 U. S. 41, this court said: "There is a motion to dismiss, based upon the ground that the Federal questions here set up were not raised in the trial court, or in the Supreme Court, of the State, with sufficient definiteness to comply with §237, Judicial Code (Act of March 3, 1911, 36 Stat. at L. 1087, 1156, chap. 231, Comp. Stat. 1913 §§968, 1214). It appears, however, from the opinion of the Supreme Court (249 Mo. 704 (8), 733), that the question of equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment was treated as being sufficiently raised, and was specifically dealt with and used against plaintiff in error. This is sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon this court, and the motion to dismiss must be denied. North Carolina P. Co. v. Zackary, 232 U. S. 248, 257."

II.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS.

Plaintiff's bill has two objects, each of which is plainly expressed:

First.—To raise the point that the United Mine Workers of America is an unlawful organization, and as a corollary that all acts done by it or its representatives in pursuit of its objects are unlawful.

Second.—That specific acts charged as committed and to be intended to be continued to be committed unless restrained, violate plaintiff's constitutional rights.

FIRST OR PRIMARY PURPOSE OF THE BILL.

The bill avers:

> Your orator says that the said United Mine Workers of America, including its said subordinate associations or branches is a secret voluntary organization having certain expressed objects, some lawful and others unlawful, and that it is in the endeavor to carry out its unlawful purposes that the matters and things herein complained of by your orator have arisen. Record, page 6.

The bill also avers:

> Your orator says that the said United Mine Workers of America, the said International Union United Mine Workers of America, the said District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America, and the said Sub-District 5 of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, voluntary associations as aforesaid, are under their Constitutions violating the common and statutory law of the State of West Virginia as well as the Constitution of said State; especially in this, to wit; in the provisions of Section 1, Section 3 and Section 4 of Article X, Constitution International Union, U. M. W. of A.; and in the provisions of Section 1 and Section 2 of Article VIII, and Section 15 of Article IX, Constitution District No. 6, U. M. W. of A.; and in the provisions of Section 1 and Section 2 of Article VIII, and Section 15 of Article IX, Constitution District No. 6, U. M. W. of A.; and in the provisions of Section 2 and Section 3 of Article I, Section 1 of Article IV, Section 6 of Article VI, and Sections 2 and 3 of Article IX, Constitution Sub-District 5 of District 6, U. M. W. of A.; and as well in the said oath which is administered to each member of the U. M. W. of A. on his initiation. Record, page 25.

The last is a direct charge that the organization by virtue of designated provisions of its Constitutions violates the common and statutory law of the State of West Virginia as well as the Constitution of said State.

Immediately following this last averment the bill contains the following:

> The jurisdiction of this court is invoked on the ground that your orator is a resident of the Northern District of West Virginia and a citizen of said State, and that each of the said defendants is a resident of a different State; to wit, no defendant is a resident of the State of West Virginia, and that the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum of two thousand dollars. Record, page 26.

SECOND OR ULTIMATE PURPOSE OF THE BILL.

The bill avers:

> "Your orator says that it has no contractual relation whatever with any one of the defendants hereto and that each of said defendants is fully aware that your orator is operating a non-union mine and will not consent to operate a union mine; that its employees are non-union; that said employees are required by your orator at the time of entering service to agree not to become connected with the union, while employed by your orator, and that if they do join the union, their employment with your orator shall cease; that with such understanding your orator's employees enter into its employment and that they are now working for your orator under such contract and with such conditions, all of which is known to these defendants and to each of them as aforesaid." Record, page 16.

The bill also avers:

> "Your orator further says that unless enjoined by this court, the said defendants acting individually and agreeing, confederating, combining and forming themselves into a conspiracy under the name of the United Mine Workers of America as aforesaid, will, in pursuance of their unlawful purposes and designs, by enticement, persuasion or coercion, in one form or the other, bring about the shutting down of your orator's mine and the ultimate destruction of its business, and will without the consent and against the will of your orator compel your orator to recognize said defendants and said associations in the further transaction of its legitimate business in mining and shipping coal, and will compel your orator to contract with its employees through the said defendants as officers of the said associations under such rules and regulations made and enforced by said association and by said defendant officers as will enable the Union to dictate the persons whom your orator shall employ and those whom your orator shall discharge, the wages your orator shall pay, and further will compel your orator to agree that each of its future employees as members of the said United Mine Workers of America shall owe and yield to said Union an allegiance which shall in all things be paramount to that which said employees would owe to your orator, and that they will thus take charge of, dictate the management of, and virtually control, your orator's business, and thereby perpetrate acts of oppression and wrong upon your orator which distinctly violate your orator's contractual common law, statutory and constitutional rights as a citizen of the State of West Virginia." Record, page 26.

The ultimate object of the bill is in the last analysis to rely upon broad constitutional contractual rights, and the averment last quoted expressly avoids mention of the Constitution of the State of West Virginia.

In making the allegation for jurisdictional purposes hereinbefore quoted as to the provisions of the Constitutions of the United Mine Workers of America being violative of the Constitution of the State of West Virginia, the pleader followed and applied the maxim that the expression of one thing excludes the other.

This rule was carefully adhered to when as to the acts committed and intended to be continued to be committed unless enjoined, the pleader omitted to limit the charge to the Constitution of West Virginia as had been done in the other case, and said, as appears from the language of the last quotation that the defendants by doing the acts complained of as committed and as intended to be continued to be committed > "thereby perpetrate acts of oppression and wrong upon your orator which distinctly violate your orator's contractual common law, statutory and constitutional rights as a citizen of the State of West Virginia."

The last averment is that these acts complained of violate plaintiff's

(a) Contractual common law rights,

(b) Contractual statutory rights,

(c) Contractual constitutional rights, and besides the allegation of the conclusion of law the facts are alleged and these facts show that plaintiff's charge is correct and that plaintiff's broad constitutional rights are involved and that they are being violated.

The contractual rights similar to those set up in plaintiff's bill have been held by this court in Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S., pages 1, 20, 21, to be constitutional rights in these words:

> "When a man is called upon to agree not to become or remain a member of the union while working for a particular employer, he is in effect only asked to deal openly and frankly with his employer, so as not to retain the employment upon terms to which the latter is not willing to agree. And the liberty of making contracts does not include a liberty to procure employment from an unwilling employer, or without a fair understanding. Nor may the employer be foreclosed by legislation from exercising the same freedom of choice that is the right of the employee.
> To ask a man to agree, in advance, to refrain from affiliation with the union while retaining a certain position of employment, is not to ask him to give up any part of his constitutional freedom. He is free to decline the employment on those terms, just as the employer may decline to offer employment on any other; for "it takes two to make a bargain." Having accepted employment on those terms, the man is still free to join the union when the period of employment expires; or, if employed at will, then at any time upon simply quitting the employment. And, if bound by his own agreement to refrain from joining during a stated period of employment, he is in no different situation from that which is necessarily > incident to term contracts in general. For constitutional freedom of contract does not mean that a party is to be as free after making a contract as before; he is not free to break it without accountability. Freedom of contract, from the very nature of the thing, can be enjoyed only by being exercised; and each particular exercise of it involves making an engagement which, if fulfilled, prevents for the time any inconsistent course of conduct."

and that liability for breaching them may be enforced:

> "The fact that the employment is at the will of the parties, respectively, does not make it one at the will of others. The employee has manifest interest in the freedom of the employer to exercise his judgment without illegal interference or compulsion and, by the weight of authority, the unjustified interference of third persons is actionable although the employment is at will." Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33.

That plaintiff has relied upon its broad federal constitutional contractual rights has been understood by counsel for defendants since the beginning of this litigation. It has also been so understood by the two lower courts. In evidence of this we quote from the first answer that was filed in the case:

> "And this respondent, for further answer unto said bill, says that it is true that the said plaintiff has no contractual relations whatever with any of the defendants to said bill, and that each of said defendants is fully aware that plaintiff is operating a non-union mine and refuses to consent to operate a union mine; that its men are non-union; that said employees are required by plaintiff at the time of entering its service to agree not to become connected with the union while employed, and that if they do join the union their said employment shall cease; that with such understanding plaintiff's employees entered its employment, and are now working with plaintiff under such contract and condition, as alleged in said bill, but this respondent avers that any condition, stipulation, contracts or agreements on the part of said plaintiff with its said employees as a condition upon which they shall enter into employment and continue in their employment with plaintiff are contrary to public policy, are in restraint of that freedom of contract accorded to all citizens of the United States under and by virtue of its Constitution and the spirit and purpose of its institutions, and can not be made a condition upon which to base any valid and binding contract or obligation between employer and employee." Record, pages 92, 93.

Separate answer of A. R. Watkins, filed May 26, 1908, Record, pages 88, 92, 93.

The same averment is made in:

Amended answer of A. R. Watkins filed August 20, 1908, Record, pages 150, 155.

and in:

Separate answer of William Green, filed July 13, 1908, Record, pages 118, 123.

and in:

Separate answer of D. H. Sullivan, filed July 13, 1908, Record, pages 133, 138, and 139.

and in the:

Joint and several answer of T. L. Lewis, et al., filed July 13, 1908, Record, pages 102, 108.

And attention is called to the fact that the separate answer of A. R. Watkins and his amended answer are under oath (Record, pages 101, 165), and that each one of the five answers mentioned is signed by Charles E. Hogg, the same who represents appellees (Record, pages 101, 165, 133, 148, 117).

In line with the contention made in the quoted portion of the separate answer of A. R. Watkins, and in line with the same averment contained in each of the remaining answers referred to, the served defendants by their counsel, Charles E. Hogg, on December 15, 1908

> "moved the Court to dissolve the temporary injunction awarded in this case on the 26th day of May, 1908, on the face of the bill and its exhibits, in so far as the said injunction inhibits, restrains and enjoins the said defendants or any of them from the use of argument, reason and persuasion to induce the employees of the plaintiff, the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, or any of them, to become members of the United Mine Workers of America or any of its subordinate branches; and also in so far as said injunction inhibits, restrains and enjoins the said defendants or any of them from interviewing or talking to any person or persons in the employment of the plaintiff, or about to enter the employment of the plaintiff, for the purpose of inducing such persons to become members of the United Mine Workers of America or any of its subordinate branches, in a peaceable and law-abiding manner and unaccompanied by intimidation, force, fraud, violence or coercion; and also in so far as said injunction inhibits, restrains and enjoins these defendants or any of them from visiting the homes of the plaintiff's employees or any of them, for the purpose of inducing such employees, by reason, persuasion and argument and unaccompanied by force, fraud, intimidation, violence or coercion, to become members of the United Mine Workers of America or any of its subordinate branches; and in so far as the said injunction inhibits, restrains and enjoins the defendants or any of them from going near or approaching the premises of the plaintiff for the purpose of interviewing or talking to or inducing the employees of the plaintiff or any of them to become members of the United Mine Workers of America or any of its subordinate branches; and in so far also as said injunction inhibits, restrains and enjoins the said defendants or any of them from unionizing or attempting to unionize plaintiff's mine without its consent, if by the term "unionizing" is meant action on the part of these defendants or any of them to induce the employees of the plaintiff or any of them to become members of the United Mine Workers of America or any of its subordinate branches by the use of argument, reason and persuasion unaccompanied by force, fraud, violence, coercion or intimidation in any form whatsoever; and in so far also as said injunction inhibits, restrains and enjoins these defendants or any of them from interfering with plaintiff's employees or any of them, if by the term "interfering" is meant that these defendants or any of them shall be precluded from interviewing and visiting plaintiff's employees in a peaceable and law-abiding manner for the purpose of inducing such employees to become members of the United Mine Workers of America or any of its subordinate branches." Transcript of Record C. C. A. Fourth Circuit, No. 949, pages 142, 143, 144.

Upon deciding this motion September 21, 1909, Judge Dayton said:

"It is to be borne in mind that this motion is made only for partial dissolution and that, too, without prejudice to defendant's right to move for full dissolution upon final hearing. It is based solely upon the ground that the allegations of the bill on its face warrant, if they do not demand it. Under these circumstances, while I am entitled to construe the allegations of the bill and all of them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff as upon demurrer, I am not inclined, at this time, to consider the charges, substantially made, that the United Mine Workers of America is an unlawful organization seeking to establish a monopoly in labor contrary to the common law, or a trust therein contrary to the Sherman act.

> Such questions deserve more consideration than have had time yet to give them and may well be postponed to the final hearing after the case has been fully made up, if it then becomes necessary to decide them under the conditions at that time existing." Ibid., page 148.

And after quoting from this court's opinion in the case of Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, Judge Dayton added:

> "And many cases are cited in support of these principles. It necessarily follows that if the employer can discharge his employee because he belongs to a labor organization, and if the employee can quit his employment because his employer employs non-union men, they, too, having these personal and individual rights, can contract with each other as to what the status of the employment in this particular shall be. The employee on his part may require as a condition precedent to the sale of his labor, that the employer shall buy it under the terms and upon the conditions prescribed by the labor union and, moreover, shall employ his other labor upon the same terms. If the employer contracts to do this he must be held to his contract for he has accepted the labor upon those conditions. Per contra the employer may contract with his employee to buy his labor upon terms other than the union ones and, in order that the union ones may not be disturbing elements in the conduct of his business, may bind his employee not to become a member of the union and thereby disqualify himself, it may be by reason thereof, from continuing his employment upon the terms and conditions of the contract. These views seem to be clearly established in principle by this Adair case and the authorities cited therein. With full knowledge that such a contract has been legally consummated between employer and employee, what legal status has the union in the premises? It may regret that its advice, help and assistance was not sought by the employee in disposing of his labor but now that it is disposed of can it come forward and incite either to break the contract? Its mission it claims is to aid and uplift labor, but it could hardly fulfill this mission by persuading men to become breakers of contracts and the repudiators of their lawful promises and pledges, and if they do, their legitimate functions are prostituted into a conspiracy to destroy others vested contract rights." Ibid., pages 150, 151.

The opinion of Judge Dayton overruling the motion to modify the temporary injunction of May 26, 1908, is reported in 172 Fed. 963.

From this decision an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, and that court dismissed the appeal for want of jurisdiction on the ground that an appeal did not lie from an order continuing an injunction. 100 C. C. A. 137, 176 Fed. 549.

THE DEFENDANTS DID NOT DEMUR TO THE BILL.

"Objections to proceedings in equity other than an entire absence of matter of equitable cognizance, must be reasonably interposed or they are waived. Sometimes the rule is stated that the existence of an adequate remedy at law is waived by submitting to the jurisdiction or by not seasonably raising the objection [Brown v. Lake Superior Iron Co., 134 U. S. 530; Kilbourn v. Sunderland, 130 U. S. 505]. In other cases it is said that the objection is waived if not reasonably interposed, where it is competent for a court of equity to grant the relief sought and it has jurisdiction of the subject matter [Allen v. Pullman's Palace Car Co., 139 U. S. 658]." Cyc. L. and P., Vol. 16, 128.

OBJECTIONS TO JURISDICTION, WHEN AND HO TAKEN, AT WHAT STAGE OF PROCEEDINGS.

"Unless the matter is wholly beyond the domain equitable cognizance, no objection to the jurisdiction equity can be made for the first time on appeal (Wylie Coxe, 15 How. 415). Ibid., p. 129. * * * According it is said that an answer to the merits submits defendar to the jurisdiction, but more frequently that an answ to the merits without objection to the jurisdiction wai such objection, and in some cases it is expressly held th the objection may be removed by specially presenting in the answer." Ibid., 132.

"Where in the court below the defendant did not den to the complaint as asking a form of relief inconsiste with the term of the contract alleged, but went to tr on the merits, the objection that the case made a found was different from the one alleged comes too la when urged for the first time in the appellate court."

Wasatch Mining Company v. Crescent Mining Compa (1893), 148 U. S. 293, syl. 5.

Defendants admitted by the answers referred to that co tractual rights under the Federal Constitution were involv but they claimed that the contractual rights plaintiff asser were to be subordinated to their rights under the same Co stitution.

While defendants admitted by the answers referred that contractual rights of both plaintiff and defendar under the Federal Constitution were involved in this ca they claimed that those contractual rights asserted plaintiff were to be subordinated to certain rights p sessed by themselves under the terms of that Constituti whereby the right of the employee to alienate, during period of his employment with plaintiff, his right to j the defendants' union is denied on the ground that to permit such a contract would be contrary to public policy and contrary to the right of the employee to join the defendants' union. It was likewise contended that such contracts, if made and upheld, would violate defendants' right to free speech under the Federal Constitution in as much as defendants claim the right to advance the cause of their union by inducing, by peaceful means, plaintiff's employees to become members of it.

On the trial of the issue presented by the motion to modify the temporary injunction of May 26, 1908, under which the above contentions were made, Judge Dayton held, September 21, 1909, that "An employer and its employees may lawfully contract with respect to the terms of the employment, and as incidental thereto that the employees shall not join a labor union and the employer shall not employ union men; and, when such a contract has been made, a combination between officers or members of the labor union to induce either party to violate the contract, with which they have no rightful concern, constitutes an unlawful conspiracy to restrain the carrying out of which the other party is entitled to an injunction." 172 Fed. 963, syl. 2.

Plaintiff's Federal constitutional rights were litigated and passed on by Judge Dayton after a hearing was had on the merits of the bill in making the injunction of May 26, 1908, permanent.

Judge Dayton said: "I do not stop now to further consider the law declaring efforts to secure the breach of contracts unlawful. I have fully considered this question in my former opinion in this case to which I now refer." 202 Fed. 512, 557.

And those same rights under the Federal Constitution were dealt with and passed on by the Circuit Court of Appeals. 131 C. C. A. 425, 214 Fed. 685.

The claim that the bill does not invoke the protection of the court for plaintiff's contractual constitutional rights under the Federal Constitution was not made in either of the lower courts.

It is too late for defendants to raise that point in this court for the first time.

Besides, they are estopped

By failing to demur.

By their answers.

By their motion to modify the temporary injunction of May 26, 1908.

By Judge Dayton's decree overruling that motion whereby the scope of plaintiff's bill on the point now sought to be raised by their motion to dismiss this appeal is "res adjudicata."

Very respectfully submitted.

HITCHMAN COAL & COKE COMPANY, APPELLANT, vs.

JOHN MITCHELL, INDIVIDUALLY; T. L. LEWIS, INDIVIDUALLY; W. B. WILSON, INDIVIDUALLY, ET ALS., APPELLEES.

MOTION TO DISMISS.

And now come John Mitchell and the other appellees in the above-entitled cause, No. 241, by Charles E. Hogg, their counsel, and move the court to dismiss the appeal allowed therein for want of jurisdiction of this court to hear and determine the same, specifying the following as the ground of said motion:

It appears from the bill filed by the appellant that the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States in and for the Northern District of West Virginia (now the District Court therein) was invoked by the appellant on the ground of diverse citizenship, and upon no other ground whatsoever; and it further appears from the said bill that the appellant at the time of the filing thereof was a citizen of the State of West Virginia, and that the appellee John Mitchell was then a citizen of the State of Indiana; the appellees T. L. Lewis, William Green, D. H. Sullivan, George W. Savage, A. R. Watkins, John Zelenka, Lee Rankin, and Thomas Hughes were at that time respectively citizens of the State of Ohio, and that the appellee W. B. Wilson was then a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania.

PETITION AND MOTION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF FOR RESPONDENTS ON THE QUESTION WHETHER THE WRIT OUGHT TO BE GRANTED and

ORIGINAL BRIEF ON THE MERITS.

STATEMENT.

The petitioner in this case, Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, on August 15, 1914, obtained an order allowing an appeal to this court from the decree rendered by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit on May 28, 1914, which brought into this court a certified transcript of the record, testimony, exhibits, stipulations and all proceedings had in said cause. (Petition p. 14.) The petitioner here is the appellant in the appeal and the respondents are the appellees therein. The record of appeal was filed on September 4, 1914, and is numbered 241.

The motion for a writ of certiorari was submitted at the October term 1914, accompanied by a certified copy of the entire record in the said cause as it is in said Circuit Court of Appeals, supplemented by certain original documents which were not printed and which are described in the petition at pp. 16-18. (Petition, p. 45.)

The petition for writ of certiorari is designated as No. 617 on the docket.

The appeal No. 241 and petition for writ of certiorari No. 617, the parties being the same in both cases and involving the same questions, are docketed to be heard together under the practice approved by this court in several cases.

> Fields v. United States, 205 U. S. 292, 51 Lawyers Ed. 807.
> Security Trust Co. v. Dent, 187 U. S. 237, 239, 47 Law. Ed. 158, 159.
> Burton v. United States, 196 U. S. 284, 295, 49 Law. Ed. 483, 486.

An examination of the petition in this case discloses tnat it is intended to be read in connection with the record, as brought into this court on the appeal, as shown by the frequent references thereto made in the petition, apparently in support of several of the matters set forth in the petition. The appellees, respondents here, served a written notice under the rules of this court and in conformity thereto that they would move this honorable court to dismiss the said appeal upon the calling of the case for a hearing on the merits, because this court is without jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause by appeal, setting forth in said notice the grounds of the want of such jurisdiction, accompanying the said notice of motion with a written argument in support thereof.

The appellees have submitted their motion to dismiss this appeal and also moved the court to affirm the decree complained of in the petition for writ of certiorari, in the event this court should be of the opinion that the said petition presents a proper case to be reviewed by means of such writ.

We rely fully upon our motion to dismiss the said appeal for want of jurisdiction of this court to hear and determine the same, and refer the court to our brief accompanying the notice given to the appellant of the motion to dismiss said appeal upon the calling thereof for a hearing upon the merits. Therefore, we have not submitted further written argument upon the said motion to dismiss, but rely upon the one accompanying said notice.

In the discussion of the questions arising upon the petition for writ of certiorari, attention will be called to such parts of the petition as contains a statement of facts and such corrections will be made therein as the record upon appeal may justly authorize or require.

The Questions Arising on This Petition

It clearly appears from the said petition and the record of appeal accompanying the same, that there are but two questions presented to this court for its consideration and decision upon this application for a writ of certiorari.

First. Does the petition of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company present a proper case for this writ?

Second. If it does present such a case, ought this court to reverse or affirm the decree of which the petitioner complains?

I.

These questions arising from the case made by the petitioner in its petition and record accompanying the same must necessarily be considered in the order just stated. Their proper consideration necessarily requires an examination of the said petition and its accompanying record, to ascertain just what matters the petitioner complained of in his bill and upon which he asked the court for relief. We must know just what the issues were in said cause—just what the District Court could properly consider and decide therein, and what therefore, was properly before the Circuit Court of Appeals for its consideration and decision.

A careful reading of the bill discloses that the matters of which the petitioner complains against the respondents concisely, but substantially and materially stated, are the following:

(a)

That petitioner is engaged in mining and shipping coal from its mine located at Benwood, West Virginia; that prior to April 1, 1906, it ran its mine with union labor; that beginning on June 12, 1906, it has since operated its mine on a non-union basis: that in the employment of its men they were informed that there was no union at the mine, that petitioner would not allow any, that no union men could remain in the employ of petitioner while recognizing and giving allegiance to the Union, and if any employee of petitioner joined the Union he could not work any longer for petitioner. (Record pp. 4-5)

(b)

That the United Mine Workers of America, its subordinate associations or branches by its officers, and servants have sought, and are now seeking by inducement, threats and intimidation, but without physical violence, to cause petitioner's employees to leave its service; to cause others engaged to enter its service to break their engagements of service and not work for petitioner, and all for the express and avowed purpose of compelling petitioner to recognize the Union, and force it to employ none but persons who are members of the United Mine Workers of America. (Record pp. 5-6.)

(c)

That said organigation, its subordinate associations and branches, is a secret one having certain expressed objects some lawful and others unlawful, and that in its endeavor to carry out its unlawful purposes the matters and things complained of have arisen. (Record p. 6.)

After setting forth excerpts from the international, district and sub-district constitutions of the Union (record pp. 6-15), it is averred that the respondents have agreed, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy under the name of the United Mine Workers of America to unlawfully persuade, entice and procure petitioner's employees to break, violate and disregard their several contracts with petitioner for the purpose of compelling it to unionize its plant against its consent, and to this end the respondents have unlawfully and maliciously agreed, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy to compel by threats, intimidation, and other unlawful means plaintiff's employees to join the Union, and thus enable the respondents to close down petitioner's mine. That the respondents have unlawfully and maliciously agreed and formed themselves into a conspiracy, the purpose of which they are proceeding to carry out and about to finally accomplish, and that is to cause petitioner's mine to be shut down, its plant to remain idle, its contracts to be broken and unfulfilled until such time as petitioner shall unionize its plant. (Record pp. 16-17.)

That after petitioner began to run its mine non-union, that efforts were made by some one or more of these respondents to bring about by inducement, persuasion, threats, intimidation, and by various means and devices unlawfully to induce petitioner's employees to cease working for it, and by use of like means to prevent men willing to work for petitioner not to engage to work, or if having engaged to work then not to go to work for petitioner. (Record pp. 21-22.)

(f)

That respondents are now endeavoring to unionize petitioner's mine and threaten that they will close down petitioner's mine and keep it closed until petitioner will agree to employ none but union labor. (Record p. 24).

(g)

That the repondents are by their acts violating the common and statutory law of the State of West Virginia as well as the constitution of that state. (Record p. 25).

(h)

That unless the respondents are enjoined from the acts hereinbefore recited they will by inducement, persuasion, or coercion in one form or another bring about or shut down the petitioner's mine and the ultimate destruction of its business, and will compel petitioner to agree that each of its future employees as members of the said organization shall owe and yield thereto an allegiance which shall in all things be paramount to that which said employees owe to petitioner, and that they will thus take charge of and dictate the management of and virtually control petitioner's business (Record pp. 26-27).

(i)

That respondents will, and are about to, indulge in the use of threats, intimdation, force, violent or abusive language, picketing petitioner's premises; picketing, patroling or guarding the streets and approaches to petitioner's premises and going to the homes or boarding houses of petitioner's employees for the purpose of intimidating or coercing them to leave petitioner's employment. (Record p. 27).

The Wrongs of Which the Petitioner Complains

As clearly indicated by the essential parts of the bill above set forth the specific wrongs complained of by the petitioner in its bill may be concisely stated:

1

That under the constitution, statutory, and common law of West Virginia the United Mine Worker of America is an unlawful labor union.

That under these same laws the respondents are by force, violence, intimidation and coercion intefering with and disturbing the petitioner in the exercise of its lawful property rights.

The answers of the respondents are responsive to the bill, denying all those allegations charging them with the unlawful acts imputed to them, and also denying that the labor organization of which they are members is unlawful. (Record pp. 53-84).

These answers were filed on September 5, 1910, upon which issue was taken by plaintiff's replication. (Record p. 52).

Issues raised by the Pleadings in this Cause

To determine the issues raised by the pleadings in the cause, an examination of the bill and answers is necessary, and such examination discloses the following as the material issues in the case:

(1)

Whether or not the labor organization known as "The United Mine Workers of America," is unlawful under the constitution, common and statutory laws of the State of West Virginia.

(2)

Whether this organization, at the time of the institution of this suit, was engaged in an attempt, by the use of any unlawful means, to induce petitioner's employees to become members of that organization.

(3)

Whether this organization, at the time of the institution of this suit was engaged in an attempt, by the use of unlawful means or otherwise, to induce the petitioner's employees to break their contracts with petitioner and to quit petitioner's employment.

Whether this organization, at the time of the institution of this suit, was engaged in an attempt to unionize petitioner's mine against its consent, and upon its failure to do so to close down petitioner's mine without its consent.

It is sought by petitioner to bring into the record of this case the action of the United Mine Workers of America, of which the respondent are members, consisting of the proceedings of certain joint conventions or conferences of coal miners and coal operators of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. (Petition, pp. 17-18).

This evidence is objected to as shown by the record accompanying the said petition, on the ground that it is not material or relevant, because there was nothing in the pleadings authorizing the consideration of such testimony. The same observation applies to other parts of the petition where this same matter is brought to the attention of this court. (Petition, pp. 20, 21, 22, 29, 38).

ARGUMENT

Does the Petition and Accompanying Record Present a Proper Case for a Writ of Certiorari?

Whether or not the United Mine Workers of America is a lawful labor organization, under the common and statute law and constitution of West Virginia, is purely a local question and must be decided by the constitution and laws of that state. An examination of the pleadings in the cause clearly shows that the constitution and laws of the United States were not mentioned in petitioner's bill, nor was any dispute or controversy raised or made therein as to the application or construction of the Federal Constitution or laws upon the determination of which the result of the suit depended; nor was any title, right, privilege or immunity set up in the bill or other claim made under the Federal Constitution or laws or treaties made in pursuance thereof. (Bill, record, pp. 2-31).

The whole theory of the bill, the entire case made by it is that the wrongful acts imputed to the respondents, and the labor union of which they were members, and the national and district constitutions under which they were acting as a union, are in violation of the common and statute laws and constitution of West Virginia.

The only ground of federal jurisdiction is based upon the diversity of the citizenship of the parties to the suit.

Whether or not a writ of certiorari ought to be awarded in any case depends upon the gravity and importance of the question involved therein.

In considering this question the court does not concern itself with the further question as to whether or not the court whose decree is sought to be reviewed did or did not commit error.

The question whether or not the court below erred only arises when the court has concluded that the case is a proper one to review by means of this writ.

The petitioner seeks at the hands of this Honorable Court to have it construe the constitution, common and statute laws of West Virginia, and have it declare whether or not a labor union is, under the organic, common and statute laws of that state, a lawful organization.

The court of last resort in West Virginia has not decided this question. It may be called upon at any time in the future to do so. If it had already decided this question, this court would feel constrained to adopt and follow the views of the State Court of West Virginia.

If the court should decide that the petition here presents a proper case for the review of the decree of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, and should actually review such decree and either affirm or reverse the same, in doing so this court would necessarily be required to interpret the constitution, common and statute laws of West Virginia and declare whether this labor union in that state is lawful or unlawful, So that it would announce a principle or doctrine binding on the Circuit Court of Appeals and the District Court of the United States sitting in West Virginia, relating to the lawfulness of labor unions in such state.

If the same question should hereafter arise in the State Courts, these courts would necessarily be required to construe and apply the constitution and laws in force in their own State on this subject, and were they to reach a conclusion different from that announced by this court it would certainly present an embarrassing situation.

In considering this phase of the petition for a writ of certiorari, we do not overlook the fact that if the State Courts have not passed upon a question on which their decision would be treated as binding upon the Federal Courts, the latter may properly adopt their own interpretation of the law applicable to the case.

As to the principle last announced, that in the absence of a state decision construing the constitution or statute law of a state, the Federal Courts will adopt their own interpretation of the law applicable to the case, an examination of the authorities discloses that in most cases it is only done by this court when the case is properly before it on an appeal or writ of error, and it becomes necessary for the court to place its own interpretation upon the constitution or law of the state in order to reach a conclusion and determine the cause.

If the question now before the court had been previously decided one way by the state court of last resort and the Circuit Court of Appeals had taken an opposite view from that held by the state court and decided accordingly, then the petition here would properly present a question of such gravity and importance as to call for the issuance of the writ. In such case there would be involved the public policy of the state declared one way by the courts of the state and another way by the Federal Court, and as the Federal Courts adhere to the decisions of the State Courts on all questions of public policy of the state, a review of the action of the Circuit Court of Appeals would perhaps properly be brought before this court by means of a writ of certiorari. It must necessarily be conceded that the recognition of labor unions in any state as lawful organizations is a matter of internal public policy of that state, and with which the Federal Courts would not interfere, so long as the nature or character of these organizations did not infringe upon the Constitution of the United States or the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof.

In Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Chicago M. & St. P. R. Co., 175 U. S. 91, 44 Law. Ed. 84, 89, the court in its opinion uses this language citing many cases to support it:

> "Questions of public policy as affecting the liability for acts done, or upon contracts made and to be performed, within one of the states of the Union,—when not controlled by the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, or by the principles of the commercial or mercantile law or of general jurisprudence, of national or universal application,—are governed by the law of the state as expressed in its own Constitution and statutes, or declared by its highest Court. Ground for the Issuance of a Writ of Certiorari

This court in repeated decisions has prescribed limits beyond which it will not go in the issuance of a writ of certiorari to review a final judgment or decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals. It has uniformly declared that its power on certiorari is one which should be sparingly exercised, and only when the circumstances of the case satisfy the court that the importance of the question involved, and the necessity of avoiding conflict between two or more courts of appeal, or between courts of appeal and the courts of the state, or some matter affecting the interest of the nation in its internal or external relations, or a matter of general interest to the public, demands such exercise,

The Petitioner Asks This Court By Means of a Writ of Certiorari to Pass on the Lawfulness of a Labor Union, a Matter Already Settled by Numerous Decisions of the State and Federal Courts.

An examination of the opinion in this case delivered by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals appearing in the record at pages 727 and 728, discloses the purpose and objects of the United Mine Workers of America, and these objects are all set forth in this opinion. It will be perceived that the object of this labor union is not different from that of other labor unions operating in the different lines of industry; and that the prime and real purpose of this organization is to secure better and safer conditions under which to labor, better pay for the laborers' services, and in various other ways to promote and insure the welfare of the members of the organization, who, of course, must be mine workers. This Honorable Court, in Gompers v. Buck's Stove & R. Co., 221, U. S., 418, 55 Law. Ed., 796, 805, in the course of its opinion referring to the right of working men to form themselves into an association, uses this clear strong language:

> "Society itself is an organization, and does not object to organizations for social, religious, business, and all legal purposes. The law, therefore, recognizes the right of workingmen to unite and to invite others to join their ranks, thereby making available the strength, influence and power that come from such association. By virtue of this right, powerful labor unions have been organized.
> But the very fact that it is lawful to form these bodies, with multitudes of members, means that they have thereby acquired a vast power, in the presence of which the individual may be helpless. This power, when unlawfully used against one cannot be met, except by his purchasing peace at the cost of submitting to terms which involve the sacrifice of rights protected by the Constitution; or by standing on such rights, and appealing to the preventive powers of a court of equity. When such appeal is made, it is the duty of government to protect the one against the many, as well as the many against the one."

Excepting a very few early cases, all of the other decisions that have been rendered by the federal or state courts relating to labor unions announce in general terms that a labor organization is a lawful association; that the laborers have the right to organize in it or join a labor union which may take joint action as to the terms of their employment; that it is of benefit to them and to the public that they should unite in their common interest and for lawful purposes, that they may stand together to command better prices for their labor than when dealing singly with their employers, and take action in a lawful manner for their general improvement in other respects bearing upon their condition as laborers.

Illustrative of the attitude of the courts toward labor organizations, showing that they have already passed upon and settled the question of their legality, we submit a few excerpts from the opinion of some of the Federal judges.

In the case of Thomas v. Cincinnati, etc., Railway Co., 62 Fed. 817, from the southern district of Ohio, discussing the question of the lawfulness of labor organizations, the court in the course of its opinion, by Taft, Judge, says:

> "Now, it may be conceded in the outset that the employees of the receiver had the right to organize into or join a labor union which should take joint action as to their terms of employment. It is of benefit to them and to the public that laborers should unite in their common interest and for lawful purposes. They have labor to sell. If they stand together, they are often able to command better prices for their labor than when dealing singly with rich employers, because the necessities of the single employee may compel him to accept any terms offered to him. The accumulation of a fund for the support of those who feel that the wages offered are below market prices is one of the legitimate objects of such an organization. They have the right to appoint officers who shall advise them as to the course to be taken by them in their relations with their employer. They may unite with other unions. The officers they appoint, or any other person to whom they choose to listen, may advise them as to the proper course to be taken by them in regard to their employment, or if they choose to repose such authority in any one, may order them, on pain of expulsion from their union, peaceably to leave the employ of their employer because any of the terms of their employment are unsatisfactory."

In Ames v. Union Pacific Railway Co., 62 Fed. 7 and especially at page 9, discussing the rules, etc. existing between the railway company and the men, the court says:

> "These rules, regulations and schedules were the result of free and voluntary conferences, held from time to time, between the managers of the railroad and the officers and representatives of the several labor organizations representing the men in the different subdivisions or branches of the service, viz., the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, the Order of Railway Conductors, the Order of Railway Telegraphers, the Union Pacific Employees' Association and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. These labor organizations like the rules, regulations and schedules, had become established institutions on this system many years before the appointment of the receivers. Two of the ablest railroad managers ever in the service of this system, and probably as able as any this country ever produced,—Mr. S. H. Clark, and Mr. Edward Dickinson, now general manager of the road—testify that these labor organizations on this system had improved the morals and efficiency of the men, and had rendered valuable aid to the company in perfecting and putting into force rules and regulations governing the operation of the Union Pacific Railway, which, confessedly, have made it one of the best managed and conducted roads in the country. The managers of this great transcontinental line testify that it has been their policy to bring it up to the highest standard of efficiency, and to afford to passengers and property transported over it all the security and protection attainable by the exercise of the highest degree of intelligence on the part of those engaged in the operation of its trains, and they cheerfully bear testimony to the fact that their efforts in this direction have been seconded and materially aided by the labor organizations which are represented in this hearing."

And the court, in its general discussion of the right of labor to organize, says:

"In this country it is not unlawful for employees to associate, consult, and confer together with a view to maintain or increase their wages, by lawful and peaceful means, any more than it was unlawful for the receivers to counsel and confer together for the purpose of reducing their wages. A corporation is organized capital; it is capital consisting of money and property. Organized labor is organized capital; it is capital consisting of brains and muscle. What is lawful for one to do it is lawful for the other to do. If it is lawful for the stockholders and officers of a corporation to associate and confer together for the purpose of reducing the wages of its employees, or of devising other means of making their investments profitable, it is equally lawful for organized labor to associate, consult, and confer with a view to maintain or increase wages. Both act from the prompting of enlightened selfishness, and the action of both is lawful when no illegal or criminal means are used or threatened. It is due to the receivers and to the managers of this property to say that they have not questioned the right of the labor organizations to appear and be heard in court in this matter, and that what they have said about these organizations has been in commendation of them and not in disparagement.

Men in all stations and pursuits in life have an undoubted right to join together for resisting oppression, or for mutual assistance, improvement, instruction, and pecuniary aid in time of sickness and distress. Such association commonly takes place between those pursuing the same occupation and possessing the same interests. This is particularly true of men engaged in the mechanical arts, and in all labor pursuits where skill and experience are required The legality and utility of these organizations can no longer be questioned."

In Atchinson, T. & S. F. Railway Co. v. Gee, 140 Fed. 153, 154, the court in the course of its opinion, with reference to the right of labor to organize and form itself into unions, says:

"I repeat what I have so often said in this case, as well as in other cases, that laboring men have a perfect right to organize themselves into unions, and have their officers, and meet in secret, and attempt thereby to better their conditions by shortening their hours, or increasing their wages, or in bringing about any other status for their own betterment."

Following an almost unbroken line of decisions, both state and federal, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit as shown by the opinion reported in 214 Fed. at page 685 decided in this case that

"The ancient English rule that labor unions were unlawful does not prevail in the United States in view of the changed conditions existing, the rule being now settled that labor may organize for its own protection and to further the in terests of the laboring classes, and may strike and persuade and induce others to join them by peaceable means, being only subject to legal restraint by injunction when they resort to unlawful means to cause injury to others to whom they have no relation, contractual or otherwise."

The questions arising in this case are not of sufficient gravity for the issuance of a writ of certiorari to bring them before this court for its consideration.

That a labor union is a lawful organization has been repeatedly decided by the Federal and State courts. The record in this case does not therefore even present a novel question.

Whether the labor union here concerned is a lawful organization under the constitution and laws of West Virginia is a local question, and not of sufficient gravity and general importance to call for consideration and decision by means of a writ of certiorari.

Whether the respondents, either as individuals or as members and officers of the said labor union, threatened to disturb the petitioner in the operation of its coal mine in the mining and shipment of coal therefrom simply raises a question of purely private and local concern, and in no aspect can it be considered a matter of public importance in that sense which calls for the issuance of a writ of certiorari by this court, to review a final decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals in a case where the jurisdiction of the district court depends entirely upon diverse citizenship.

It seems clear to us, and therefore we respectfully submit, that this case presents no question of such gravity and importance as to call into exercise the power of this Court by means of a writ of certiorari, to review the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals rendered therein on the 28th day of May, 1914, and that the prayer of the petition should not be granted.

II

MERITS OF THE CASE

The petitioner, Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, in its petition for a writ of certiorari by its counsel assumes that this is a case of such gravity and importance that the writ ought to be granted, and the entire record of the case now before this court on appeal, be treated as a return to the writ, (petition p. 43), and upon the said petition and record accompanying the same, counsel for the petitioner presented an extended written argument in support of their contention that the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals should be reversed.

To argue the merits of this case is quite unnecessary, unless the court concludes that the petition presents a proper case for its review of the decree, of which complaint is made by means of certiorari.

And it is also averred in the petition for the writ of certiorari that > "Inherent in this case from the beginning and patent upon the face of the bill filed by petitioner, is the fact, entirely apart from the question of diversity of citizenship, that the contractual and property rights sought to be protected by said bill depend upon the terms of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and upon the terms of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, 26 Stat. L. 209. As a citizen of West Virginia petitioner is necessarily a citizen of the United States, and as such it is entitled to the full protection of its constitution and laws. Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36. District Judge Dayton's opinion deals, from beginning to end, with the contractual and property rights of petitioner, as protected by the terms of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments and by the Sherman-Anti Trust Law. On page 34 of his opinion (Record, p. 783) he refers directly to the case of Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, with the observation that 'In this latter case the Supreme Court holds such a provision to be an invasion of personal liberty as well as of the right of property guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States;' 'and on page 60 (Record, p. 806) he says: Such a combination is clearly a > common law conspiracy, too far-reaching to be reasonable, in restraint of trade, as well, in my judgment, a direct violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law.' The opinion and judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals consists of a difference of view as to the construction and application of Federal Law, constitutional and statutory, as applied by District Judge Dayton to the facts of this case." (Petition pp. 12-13).

If, therefore, this court should find from the record in this case (against the contention of the respondents) that the jurisdiction of the District Court did not depend alone upon diverse citizenship, but that the case also involved a federal question conferring jurisdiction on this court to consider and determine the case on appeal, then the merits of the cause must be considered irrespective of the petition for a writ of certiorari.

In the event that this court should decide to consider this case upon its merits, counsel for the respondents here present the merits from their view of them as shown by the petition and the record accompanying the same.

Preliminary Statement.

Before entering upon the consideration of the merits of this case, there are some matters appearing in the petition that will be here noticed, lest they be taken as true and injustice be thereby done to the respondents.

There appears in the petition this statement:

> "Passing to the proof it is safe to say that the material allegations of the bill filed in the lower Court have been abundantly sustained. And it is also safe to say that no controversy arose in that Court over the material facts. So the issue here is rather one of law on those facts." (Petition, p. 16).

An examination of the record presented with petition the shows that this is an error; that all the material allegations of the bill imputing unlawful and wrongful acts to the respondents are denied by answer. (Record pp. 53-84).

So the allegation that the labor union known as the United Mine Workers of America, and its National, District, and Sub-District constitutions are in violation of the constitution and laws of West Virginia is likewise denied.

As a fact to prove it it is stated that > "The United Mine Workers of America are a secret body," (Petition p. 20)

This allegation is made in the bill and denied by the answer and the proof is overwhelming that it is not a secret organization.

It is also stated in the petition that

> "Although the United Mine Workers as an organization have to date waged an industrial war against the non-union fields, the Union operators still complain of the competition from those fields and urge the mine workers to greater efforts along the same line and to other and more desperate and unlawful acts." (Petition, p. 24),

There is no allegation of this sort, or even of a kindred character, appearing in the bill and this statement is entirely foreign to the case as made by the pleadings and evidence relevant to the issues arising in the cause.

It is futher stated in the petition as a fact

> "And being confronted with a United Mine Worker membership of more than 300,000, but now at the time of the preparation of this statement, although, of course, outside of the record, claimed to be more than 400,00, and with an income of more than $1,500,000.00 per annum, the operators must perforce and do submit." (Petition, pp. 24-25).

This averment in the petition is intended to convey the statment as a fact, that owing to the large number composing the membership of the United Mine Workers of America distributed however throughout the United States, Canada and Nova Scotia, the operators in a particular state must and do submit to the unionizing of their mines against their own consent and contrary to their wishes and desires.

This is not true, as will be shown further on in this brief.

It is also stated as a fact in the petition that the officials of this labor union claim that they are run out of the State of West Virginia, or their lives endangered if they stayed after being discovered. (Petition, p. 26).

This is not true of West Virginia as a state, although in some isolated places there appears to have been one or two acts of violence committed by thughs or irresponsible persons against an official of the Union, but such act is not imputable by the evidence to the operators.

In West Virginia there are many operators who are running their mines non union, while in other parts of the state they are employing union labor and the large accretion of the membership mentioned in the petition at pp. 24 and 25 comes largely from the State of West Virginia itself.

It is also stated as a fact in the petition that the United Mine Workers > "have sent out men to the trade to boycott West Virginia coal. (Petition, p. 30).

There is no allegation of this sort made against the respondents anywhere in the pleadings and the evidence does not justify this statement as a fact. If some idividual member of the Union of his own accord, entirely independent of his organization and in inviolation of its constitution did things of this sort, it cannot be imputed to the Union as one of its acts on the question whether or not it is an unlawful organization.

It is also stated in the petition that

> "reports were put in circulation by the Union's officials that the mine was going to be unionized, and that unless the men joined the United Mine Workers they would soon be out of their jobs." (Petition p. 40)

There is no evidence to fix upon the officers of this labor union the fact here averred, if any such reports were put in circulation by the officers; nor is there any evidence that these officers caused such reports to be put in circulation.

It is further stated in the petition that > "Early in September, 1907, the defendant Thomas Hughes was sent by the officials of the United Mine Workers into the Panhandle District of West Virginia with instructions to organize the non-union mines, and compel them to recognize the Union, or else be shut down. (Petition p. 41)

There is no evidence whatever to show that Thomas Huges was sent out as a representative of the Union for the purpose of organizing a non-union mine or compelling any non-union mine to recognize the Union, or to shut down any mine.

He, the respondent Hughes, was never served with process to answer in this case, he filed no answer to the the bill, he made no appearance in the case, nor did he give his evidence therein.

The record discloses that the said Hughes was simply directed to visit the employees in the Panhandle District engaged in the coal mines, and talk with them on the subject of joining the union and to invite them to become members of the Union. He was never authorized by the United Mine Workers, or any of its officials, even to attempt to organize a mine upon a union basis, or to shut down the mine upon the refusal of any operator to recognize the Union. As we shall see in the course of this brief, there is a great difference between employees working in a mine who simply belong to the Union, and the men who are members of the Union and work under a contract with the operator who has organized his mine upon a union basis, and thereby recognizes the Union in his business of mining coal.

The foregoing preliminary statement correcting certain errors appearing in the petition, has been made by counsel for the respondents lest an omission to notice these erroneous statements of fact might be taken and treated as conceding the truth thereof. In subsequent parts of this brief on the merits, the whole case will be taken up, which will embrace the pleadings and the issues thereby made between the parties, the evidence bearing on these issues and the law applicable thereto. We shall also endeavor to show to the court that a very great deal of the testimony introduced by the petitioner in support of his case is entirely foreign to any of the issues therein, and therefore ought not and will not be considered by this court, and was not considered by the Circuit Court of Appeals in reaching its conclusion

The case as made by petitioner's bill and the answers thereto.

The allegations of the bill define the limits of the petitioner's right to an injunction, and these allegations being controverted by answer must be proved as alleged.

Directing the attention of the court to those material averments upon which the claim here to relief is founded, the following is a concise statement thereof:

That petitioner is engaged in the business of mining and shipping coal; that on June 12, 1906, it began to run its mine non-union: that every man who enters its employment agrees not to join the United Mine Workers, and if he does do so, he can no longer work for petitioner. (Record p. 5)

(2)

That petitioner has made known to this labor union its purpose to run its mine non-union, but that this organization is now acting by inducement, threats and intimidation, but so far without physical violence, to cause petitioner's employes to leave its employment, and to prevent others, who are willing, to enter its service, and all for the purpose of compelling petitioner to employ only union labor. (Record p 5)

(3)

That the excerpts from the constitution of the national and subordiate branches of this labor union set forth in the bill indicate its character and purpose. (Record pp. 6-15)

(4)

That respondents as officers of the United Mine Workers and as individual members thereof have formed a conspiracy, under the name of United Mine Workers of America, to unlawfully persuade, entice and procure petitioner's employes to violate and disregard their several contracts with petitioner, for the purpose of compelling petitioner to Unionize its mine without its consent, and have maliciously formed themselves into a conspiracy, to compel by threats and intimidation petitioner's employes to join the Union. (Record pp. 15, 16)

(5)

That respondents were informed of petitioner's purpose to run its mine non-union and that each of its employes were under contract not to join the Union, and that if any employe joined the Union his employment would cease. (Record, p. 16)

That respondents have unlawfully and maliciously formed themselves into a conspiracy, the purpose of which they are about to accomplish, which is to shut down petitioner's mine, to cause its plant to remain idle, its contracts to be broken and unfulfilled, until petitioner shall unionize its plant, and submit to the demands of the Union; that the effectuating of this purpose is imminent and the damage threatened great and irreparable. (Record pp. 16, 17)

That petitioner pays as much as the Union scale of wages, and that respondents have conspired to unionize petitioner's mine and are thus seeking power to strengthen the Union in future contests with the employers of labor, to compel all mine workers to join the Union and establish a monopoly. (Record p. 17)

That in the Annual Convention of the United Mine Workers held in Janury, 1907, it was openly stated— "Organized labor contends that as industry cannot exist without labor, labor has the right to say under what conditions it shall be employed, thereby directing the management of the productive end of the business." (Record p. 17)

(9)

That certain other matters occurring in said convention, indicative of the object and purpose of this organization are set out in the bill. (Record pp. 17, 18)

(10)

There are also set out in the bill certain matters occurring in sub-district conventions held in March and April, 1907, by the United Mine Workers. (Record p. 19, 20)

(11)

That in said convention of April, 1907, this resolution was adopted: "Resolved, by this Ninth Annual Convention that the sub-district officers be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the Sub-District as quickly as it can be done." (Record p. 20)

(12)

That some one or more of the respondents have by inducement, persuasion, threats and intimidation and various means and devices, made effort to induce petitioner's employes to cease working for it, and by like means have sought to induce men willing to work for petitioners not to enter its employment. (Record, p. 21,22)

(13)

That respondents further proceeding to carry out this conspiracy, are now endeavoring to unionize petitioner's mine and threaten to close down its mine and keep it closed until petitioner agrees to employ none but union labor. (Record p. 24)

(14)

That while respondents have so far been unable to induce petitioner's employes to quit its service, still respondent Hughes has recently stated to one of its miners whom he was trying to induce to join the Union, that he had succeeded in having one hundred and twenty-five men at the Hitchman mine to agree to become members of the United Mine Workers and as soon as he got twenty-five more, he would shut the Hitchman mine down. (Record p. 25)

That the United Mine Workers of America, the international, district and sub-district associations, are, under their constitution, violating the common and statutory law and constitution of the State of West Virginia, specially pointing out the unlawful parts of said constitution. (Record p. 25)

(16)

That unless enjoined from so doing, respondents conspiring so to do, will by enticement, persuasion or coercion, in one form or the other, shut down petitioner's mine and destroy its business, and without its consent will compel petitioner to recognize and contract with the United Mine Workers in the further transaction of its business. (Record pp. 26, 27)

(17)

Then follows the prayer of the bill for an injunction. (Record pp. 22-31.)

It clearly appears from the said bill, of which we have just given a synopsis, that the petition charges this labor union to be a conspiracy, formed for these purposes:

(a)

To cause by threats and intimidation petitioner's employes to quit its employment and to prevent others from entering its employment.

(b)

To cause as conspirators the petitioner's employes to break their several contracts with it, and to compel by threats and intimidation these same employes to join the labor union.

(c)

To cause petitioner's mine to be shut down, the plant to remain idle, its contracts to be broken and unfulfilled, until petitioner shall unionize its mine against its consent.

(d)

That proceeding to carry out their said conspiracy, the respondents are now endeavoring to do the damage in the bill set forth, and unless enjoined from so doing they will carry into effect their purpose to injure petitioner.

Upon this bill duly verified and accompanied by certain affidavits appearing in the record, a temporary restraining order commensurate with the allegations of the bill was issued, and afterwards the court awarded a temporary injunction of the very same character. (Record pp. 32-36.)

An examination of the injunction discloses that it is a far-reaching and most drastic process.

After a fruitless effort on the part of these respondents to have the injunction order modified, those who had been served with process to answer the bill filed answers thereto, all of which appear in the record. (Record pp. 53-84.)

Three of the respondents, John Mitchell, W. B. Wilson and Thomas Hughes, never were served with process, and never appeared to the case, although the District Court decreed against them just as if they had been so served, or entered their appearance.

The sufficiency of the bill was not called in question by demurrer, as the practice in equity under the old rules then was, although the wrongful acts imputed to them were embodied in allegations of a most general character. The character of the threats, coercion and intimidation imputed to respondents was not alleged, nor how their wrongful purpose were to be effected, which were alleged to be imminent, and were about to be carried out, and that an injunction was necessary to prevent it.

But the respondents did not attack the bill because of its many general and indefinite charges of wrong and injury threatened to the business and employes of the petitioners, but met these charges by means of answers challenging their truth and putting the petitioner on proof thereof.

The joint and several answer of T. L. Lewis, William Green, D. H. Sullivan, George W. Savage, John Zelenka and Lee Rankin, six of the respondents served with process to answer the bill, appears in the record at pages 53-68, and the answer of A. R. Watkins, the other respondent summoned to answer, at pp 68 84.

On November 5, 1910, a general replication was filed to each of these answers. (Record p. 84)

These answers deny positively all the allegations of the bill imputing to these respondents any unlawful or wrongful acts, and thereby put petitioner on proof of the same.

While these answers do not deny that petitioner made a separate contract with every one of the miners entering its employment agreeing not to become a member of the United Mine Workers of America while in its service, and upon doing so their employment should cease, the answers do deny knowledge of this fact on the part of the respondents.

The facts proved in support of the Case as made by the pleadings Therein.

The Hitchman Coal and Coke Company was organized under the laws of the State of West Virginia in the year 1901, and began operations at Benwood, Ohio County, West Virginia, in the early summer of that year. The opening up of the mine consumed some time, and the actual mining of coal did not commence until in the winter of 1902. At that time, however, the Company did not ship any coal. The Company began its operations upon a non-union basis; that is it employed its labor independently of and without relation to the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America. (E. T. Hitchman's testimony, record p. 248)

Previous to its entering upon the operation of mining coal at Benwood, the Hitchman Company entered into a contract with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for the furnishing of coal to the engines of the latter Company; and during the early part of its operations all the coal mined by the company was delivered upon the engines of the railroad company; the amount mined at first was very small; it practically commenced at nothing and gradually increased, until now this mine is a regular coaling station for the railroad Company, and is its only coaling station in the vicinity of Benwood. (E. T. Hitchman's testimony, record p. 247)

The coal company continued to operate its mine upon a non-union basis until the month of April, 1903, when it entered into a contract with its employes through the officers of the United Mine Workers of America, adopting the scale of wages demanded by the members of that organization, and agreeing to observe the rules and conditions of employment. (E. T. Hitchman's testimony, record pp. 249,250).

The company continued to operate its mine upon what is known as a "union basis," for three years, or until some time in April, 1906; (Hitchman, record p. 252) the first contract or agreement expired in 1904, and was renewed for a period of two years, or until April, 1906 At that time the men refused to work longer, because no agreement could be made between the employes and the company as to the rate of wages and conditions of employment. (Hitchman, record p 252).

About June 21, 1906, after the mine had been shut down and operations suspended for a period of about fifty days, the company resumed operations upon a non-union basis, with the understanding between the officials of the company and its employes that the company would deal with each one of them individually from that time on, and the men who had formerly been in the employ of the company were informed by its president, that each man would have to seek employment for himself, and that the company would have no further relations with the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America. (E. T. Hitchman's testimony, record pp. 253, 254.)

After resuming operations in June, 1906, it was agreed between the company and its employes that the company's mine would be operated upon a non-union basis; its board of directors passed a resolution whereby a fixed policy was adopted by the company to employ none but non-union laborers; (Hitchman, record p. 254) the agreement of employment between the company and its men was verbal up to January, 1908, but about that time and since the institution of this suit the company issued employment cards, in the following words:

"I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employe of the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company; that the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal and Coke Co., I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said Company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company that I will not make any efforts amongst its employes to bring about the unionizing of tnat mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard the same read."

(Petition p. 11; Cott's evidence, record pp. 264, 265).

Thereafter, each and every man who entered the company's employment was required to sign one of these cards before being accepted as an employe; and any applicant for employment who refused to sign the card, was denied employment.

(R. J. Cott's, testimony, record pp. 264, 265.)

The employment card quoted above is substantially the same as the verbal contract had with the men previous to January, 1908.

(R. J. Cott's testimony, record p. 265)

From and after June, 1906, up to and including the date of the taking of the testimony herein, the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company continued to operate its mine upon a non-union basis, with an understanding or agreement between it and its employes, that the company would employ none but men who were not members of the United Mine Workers of America; and from January 1, 1908, the men on their part agreed that they would not become members of the United Mine Workers of America so long as they continued in the employment of that Company.

During all this time from the early part of 1902 up to the time of the taking of the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff in this case, the business of the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company has increased naturally and gradually, from a production and sale of about 17,000 tons of coal in 1902, to a production and sale of more than 281,000 tons for the first eleven months of the year 1910.

(R. J. Cotts' testimony, record pp. 260, 261.)

In the year 1902, all but about 800 tons of the coal produced by the Hitchman Company was sold to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and delivered upon its engines at Benwood, West Virginia; while in 1910 more than half of the coal produced was sold in the open market and was designated upon the books of the coal company as "commercial coal" as distinguished from "engine coal;" and nearly all of this "commercial coal" was shipped to ports on the Great Lakes for transportation by vessel to the northern country, for delivery at ports on Lake Superior.

(R. J. Cotts' testimony, record pp. 260, 261;
W. H. Koch's testimony, record pp. 295, 296.)

During all these years the price received by the coal company for both "commercial coal" and "engine coal" would average from ninety-five cents to one dollar per ton; but during the time of the strike in the anthracite fields, during the year 1903, the price for "commercial coal," prior to April 1, of that year, was about three dollars per ton.

(R. J. Cotts' testimony, record pp. 262.)

During this time, at the average price of from ninety-five cents to one dollar per ton, the average profit derived by the coal company from the mining and shipping of its coal was twenty-five cents per ton

(W. H. Koch's testimony, record p. 275.)

During the summer of 1907, the officials at that time in charge of the affairs of the United Mine Workers of America for the district in which the Hitchman Company's mine is located called upon the officers of the coal company, and discussed with them the renewal of the relations which had theretofore existed between that company and the miner's organization; at each of these meetings, at least one of which was held in the company's office, the officers of the company refused to consider the renewal of their former relations to the union, and the representatives of the Union Mine Workers of America were informed that it was the fixed and determined policy of that company to employ none but miners who were not members of the union.

(W. H. Koch's testimony, record pp. 286, 294.)

In September, 1907, about six weeks after the visit of the officials as above stated, Thomas Hughes, a representative of the United Mine Workers, visited Benwood and its vicinity in an attempt to induce the miners employed by the Hitchman and other coal companies operating in that community, to become members of the United Mine Workers.

(W. H. Koch's testimony, record p. 297.)

In his work as organizer, of soliciting and securing miners to become members of the union, Hughes talked to the employes of the Hitchman and other companies, upon the streets of Benwood, (Wesley Corns' testimony, record p. 332), visited some of the men at their homes, (E. C. Pickett's testimony, record pp. 305) addressed the men on one occasion in an open meeting, (E. C. Pickett's testimony, record, p. 307) and talked with one or more of the officers of the coal company as to the reason why that company refused to employ any but non-union labor, (E. C. Pickett's testimony, record p. 306). In an open air meeting of the men, which was also attended by the superintendent of the coal company, Hughes simply argued to the men the advantages to be derived from membership in the United Mine Workers of America (E. C. Pickett's testimony, record p. 311). And an examination of the entire record will disclose that the conduct and methods employed by Hughes at all times were quiet, peaceable and orderly.

As a result of the efforts of Hughes, about twenty or twenty-five men employed by the Glendale Coal Company, a separate corporation but managed from the same office and by the same men in charge of the operations of the Hitchman Company, were induced to become members of the United Mine Workers of America, and the next morning they were discharged by the superintendent of the Hitchman Company, who was also superintendent of the Glendale Company. (E. C. Pickett's testimony, record pp. 310, 311.) This was in the latter part of September or the first part of October, 1907.

(E. C. Pickett's testimony, p. 312.)

The following named respondents were never at or near the mine of petitioner, nor at any time met any of the employes of the petitioner, and the evidence fails to connect them in any manner whatsoever with the business of the petitioner after it began to run its mine non-union: John Mitchell, T. L. Lewis, W. B. Wilson, George W. Savage, D. H. Sullivan, Lee Rankin, John P. White, Franklin J. Hayes, Edwin Perry, John Moore, John Albasin, William Roy and William Applegarth.

The only persons who ever visited the plant or mine of the petitioner after it started to run non-union were the respondents Green, Watkins, Zelenka and Hughes. The other respondents are not connected in any manner with even a visit to the petitioner's place of business and no attempt was made to show such fact.

The United Mine Workers of America is a voluntary unincorporated organization created for the purpose of uniting employes that produce or handle coal and coke in or around coal mines, and to ameliorate their conditions by methods of conciliation, arbitration or strikes. (Record pp 6, 7.) The organization is composed of International, District, Sub-District, and Local Unions. (Record p. 6.) The International Union has jurisdiction over all Districts, Sub-Districts and Local Unions. (Record p. 6.)

The officers of the International Union are a president, vice president, secretary-treasurer, and executive board, to be composed of one member from each district, and of this board the president, vice-president and secretary-treasurer are members ex officio. (Record p. 6.)

District No. 6 embraces the state of Ohio, (Record p. 11) and sub-District No. 5 under the jurisdiction of District 6, includes certain territory in Ohio, and the counties of Hancock, Brooke, Ohio and Marshall in West Virginia. (Record p. 13.)

In 1906 said District 6 had a membership of 36, 372, and on March 1, 1907, the membership of Sub District 5 was 12,500, with 108 local Unions. (Record p. 15.)

Each local union is a part of the national organization; the national conventions are made up of representatives of the local unions. (Testimony of Lewis, p. 516.)

It is not now and never has been the policy of the mine worker's organization to use force or coercion or any unlawful methods to promote its jurisdiction or growth, and if such methods were employed its existence could not be maintained. (Testimony of Lewis, Record p. 516.)

The objects and methods of the organization of labor known as the United Mine Workers of America appear in the testimony of the witnesses, Savage, (Record pp. 490-495) Lewis, (Record pp. 506-516, 520-528, 531-533) and Sullivan (Record pp. 623-626.

General Purposes of This Labor Union.

In general the purpose of the organization is to secure for men who work in or about coal mines throughout the entire country, better wages, a better ventilation of mines, a better drainage of them, a more efficient system of mines inspection, a uniform price for mining coal where local conditions are practically the same, the lessening of the dangers necessarily incident to the work of the coal miner, the inhibition by proper legislation of child labor in the mines, the making of collective contracts for definite periods between the operators and his employes, and the education of ignorant immigrants who are daily finding employment in mines with reference to the great and imminent dangers that almost continually beset the employment of the coal miner, to caution him against this danger, and the care he must exercise to avoid it and how he must avoid it.

Substitution of Defendants.

When the case came on for final hearing, viz, on the 18th day of January, 1913, the petitioner on that day filed its petition setting forth that since the institution of this suit, and during the pendency thereof, the respondents John Mitchell, T. L. Lewis, W. B. Wilson, William Green, D. H. Sullivan, A. R. Watkins, John Zelenka and Lee Rankin had ceased to be officers, as stated in the final decree appearing in the record at pages 694-701; that John P. White had then become President of the International organization, Frank J. Hayes Vice-President thereof, and Edwin Perry Secretary-Treasurer thereof; that John Moore had then become President of District 6, John Zelenka its Vice President, and John Albasin had then become President of Sub-District 5, William Roy its Vice-President, and William Applegarth its Secretary-Treasurer. Thereupon this cause was discontinued as to said Mitchell, Lewis, Wilson, Green, Sullivan, Watkins, Zelenka and Rankin in their official capacities, and the said White, Hayes, Perry, Moore, Zelenka, Albasin, Roy and Applegarth, as officers aforesaid, were substituted in lieu of the said former officers.

The motion to make this substitution, as sought by the prayer of the petition, was objected to, but the said objections were overrled and disallowed, and said substitutions made, notwithstanding said objections. (Record pages 696-698.)

After this substitution was made, and that, too, without notice or hearing, a decree was entered against these new and substituted defendants perpetuating the injunction as to them, and perpetuating the injunction also in their individual capacities, as to the said Mitchell, Lewis, Wilson, Green, Sullivan, Watkins, Zelenka and Rankin. (Record pages 698-701.)

Motion to Dismiss This Suit as to Unserved Defendants.

A motion to dismiss this suit as to the unserved defendants was made on January 14, 1908; (Record p. 216) this motion being called in the record "Motion and Plea" It is really a motion in writing to dismiss this suit as to the respondents Mitchell, Wilson and Hughes. The motion in writing of these three appellants, improperly denominated a plea, appears in the record at pages 209-216.

On the 5th day of November this motion came on to be heard, and, while, holding that said motion and plea in effect constituted a special appearance for the sole purpose of asking a dismissal of this cause on the ground of the non-service of process, nevertheless, the court refused to dismiss the suit as to these respondents on the ground that the bill charges a conspiracy between the non-served defendants and those served in the cause, and that, therefore, said Mitchell, Wilson and Hughes are proper parties before the court by representation, through service upon their co-defendants. (Record p. 208.)

on the part of the petitioner for writ of certiorari consists of certain documentary and oral testimony. A part of the documentary evidence offered and relied upon by the said petitioner is not printed in the record and consists in the original documents themselves transmitted to the Circuit Court of Appeals by agreement of parties, either party being at liberty to make use of these documents or any parts thereof that may be pertinent and material to the issues.

A large part of these unprinted documents are set forth in the opinion delivered in this case by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals as reported in 214 Federal at page 707.

Immaterial and Irrelevant Testimony.

There is a large volume of documentary evidence, part of which is referred to above and set forth in the Court's opinion, as already stated, offered by the petitioner subject to exceptions, which respondents insist is irrelevant and immaterial and not applicable, therefore, to any issue raised in this case. There is also much oral evidence on the part of the petitioner to which the same objection applies. This testimony, for convenience sake, may be divided into three classes: (a) those documents introduced before any oral evidence was offered, and which appear in the record at pages 85-221; (b) those which were offered in connection with oral evidence and not published in the record and (c) those parts of the oral evidence designated in the exceptions taken to this immaterial and irrelevant testimony.

Exceptions to Certain Parts of the Documentary and Oral Evidence offered by the Petitioner in Support of Its Bill.

An examination of the record discloses that all testimony offered in support of plaintiff's case was received by the Court subject to exceptions to be made thereafter to any portion of such testimony that either party might deem immaterial and irrelevant or incompetent or for any other reason.

At the conclusion of the hearing of the cause respondents filed their exceptions in writing to such parts of the evidence as they regarded as incompetent, which appear in the record at pages 222-247, assigning under each exception the reason or reasons therefor.

It may be well to state that these exceptions to the evidence were taken before the evidence was reduced to narrative. The evidence taken and transcribed by the stenographer consisted of three volumes and when reduced to narrative consisted of one volume. Furthermore, the paging of the original evidence after being reduced to narrative form was different from that contained in the original transcript. Therefore, the page references in the exceptions do not correspond to the paging of the record, but this will not likely occasion the court any inconvenience, inasmuch as there is sufficient matter in each exception to bring the court's attention to the character of the evidence excepted to, and the issues already defined by the pleadings will make clear to the court what evidence is material and relevant and that which is not so.

Questions Arising upon the Record in this Cause.

It seems to us that the following questions are involved in this cause, raised by the pleadings and proofs therein and the motion made to dissolve the temporary injunction awarded therein and the final decree perpetuating the same:

(1)

If the contract between the petitioner and its various employees hereinbefore set forth (ante p. 39.) will be upheld in a court of equity and the respondents knew of its contents and terms at the time this suit was brought, can they be enjoined from soliciting these employees to become members of said labor organization, or from using reason argument and persuasion to induce such employees to join the same?

(2)

Is the United Mine Workers of America and its subordinate branches a lawful labor organization under the constitution, common and statutory laws of West Virginia?

(3)

If it is not a lawful organization, what part or parts of its national constitution or the district and sub-district constitutions are contrary to the laws of West Virginia, of which the petitioner can complain in this suit?

(4)

If the question can properly be considered as involved in this case, is the United Mine Workers of America a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, within the meaning of the Act of Congress of April 2, 1890, 26 Stat. L. 209, generally known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Law?

(5)

Was the United Mine Workers of America, or its subordinate associations or branches, by its officers, agents, employees or servants, prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit, seeking by inducements, threats and intimidation to cause petitioner's employees to leave its service, and others who had engaged to enter its service, to break their engagements and not work for petitioner, and compel petitioner to employ none but persons who were members of said labor union?

(6)

Had the respondents, prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit, agreed, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy under the name of the United Mine Workers of America to unlawfully persuade, induce and procure by coercion, intimidation and threats, petitioner's employees to break and disregard their several contracts with it, all with the avowed purpose of compelling petitioner to unionize its plant; and did they, to such end, unlawfully and maliciously agree, confederate, combine and form themselves into a conspiracy to compel by threats, intimidation and other unlawful means, petitioner's employees to join said union?

(7)

Did respondents unlawfully and maliciously agree together, confederate and combine and form themselves into a conspiracy prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit, the purpose of which they were proceeding to carry out, and were about to finally accomplish, viz; to cause petitioner's mine to be shut down, its plant to remain idle, its contracts to be broken and unfulfilled until such time as petitioner should unionize its mine and surrender the control and management of its business to the said labor union?

(8)

If the question is involved in this case by the pleadings therein, were the respondents, prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit, as members of the United Mine Workers of America, in a combination or conspiracy with the coal operators of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, known as the Central Competitive Field, to unionize petitioner's mine without its consent?

(9)

Is there anything in this cause arising upon the record thereof, authorizing the court to hold that the respondents had not the lawful right to use reason, argument and persuasion to solicit, invite or peacably induce petitioner's employees to become members of the United Mine Workers of America?

(10)

Could the court enter a decree perpetuating the injunction awarded in this case against the respondents Mitchell, White and Hughes without the service of process upon them to answer said bill in the absence of any appearance by them to the action?

(11)

Could the court render a decree perpetuating the injunction against the respondents White, Hayes, Perry, Moore, Zelenka, Albasin, Roy and Applegarth, in their official capacities without service of process upon them to appear and be heard in this cause against the rendition of such a decree?

ARGUMENT.

The Validity of Petitioner's Contract with its Employes presents the first question for our consideration. If the court should find this contract to be against public policy, there is really no other question open for discussion, because there is no evidence whatever in this case, as disclosed by the record, of any act imputable to the respondents or any of them, of which the petitioner can complain.

The record is wholly barren of any proof of intimidation, coercion, violence or other unlawful means used by the respondents to induce any of petitioner's employes to join the Union of the Mine Workers, or to make effort of any sort to induce petitioner's employes to quit its service.

This contract is fully set forth in the petition at page 11, and in a former part of this brief at page 39. It appears in the record, however, that the agreement between the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company and its employes when it began to run its mine non-union in June, 1906, was verbal and not exactly in substance like the one in writing, as will hereafter be shown.

It will not be overlooked, in considering this question, that the plant of the petitioner is located in the territory embraced in Sub-District 5 of the United Mine Workers of America, which is composed of the counties of Belmont, Jefferson, Tuscarawas, Harrison, Carrol, and that part of Starke County south of Canton, in the State of Ohio, and the counties of Hancock, Brooke, Ohio and Marshall, in West Virginia. (Record p. 15.) It also appears in the bill that in this sub-district there are 108 locals, with a membership of 12,500 men. (Record p. 18.)

This contract constitutes an agreement between the petitioner and its several hundred employes, and another company which is under the same management as that of the petitioner, with its various employes, whereby not a single one of the other 12,500 miners in this sub-district can obtain employment, if this agreement is valid. The only step to bring about this result would be for the other employers of coal miners in this sub-district to adopt the same agreement, and then the 12,500 men would be without employment, and consequently without means of obtaining a livelihood for themselves and families. Can such a contract as this be upheld under the liberal doctrines of a court of equity upon the ground of public policy?

An examination of the cases discloses that there are three classes of employers of labor:

Those who employ both union and non-union men in the same plant.

(b)

Those who employ only union men.

Those who employ only non-union men.

The "open shop" applies to those plants which come under class (a) where no discrimination is made as to union or non-union employes. The "closed shop" is where one class or the other of miners or laborers is absolutely excluded. That is, where either non-union laborers are not employed, or where union laborers are not employed. The petitioner in this case has attempted to establish the policy of a "closed shop," shutting all of its avenues of employment against persons belonging to the United Mine Workers of America.

The cases which have arisen, and they are not numerous, involving contracts applying to "closed shops," are those where the attempt has been made to employ only union laborers, and excluding non-union men. The controlling principle, however, must be the same in either case. If there cannot be by valid contract any "closed shop" policy applicable to union laborers, then it must necessarily follow that there can be no "closed shop" composed entirely of non union laborers.

A recent author has said:

> "Contracts between an employer or an association of employers and a labor union, providing for the employment of members of the union only, are of very recent origin, and the decisions in respect to their validity few in number and not altogether harmonious."
> Martin on The Modern Law of Labor Unions, Sec. 152.

The first case considered by this author is that of Curran v. Galen, 152 N. Y. 33, 46 N. E. 297, 57 Am. St. Rep. 496, 37 L. R. A. 802. This case was decided in 1897, and is said by the author to be the earliest case of its kind in a court of last resort. The following is the syllabus of this case as reported in 57 Am. St. Rep. at page 496:

> "An agreement between an association of brewers and an assembly of workmen that all employes of the former shall be members of the latter, and that no employe shall work more than four weeks without becoming such member, is against public policy and the interests of society, and cannot justify an action of members of such assembly in procuring a discharge of a workman because of his failure to become a member thereof."

The court, in the course of its opinion, considering the agreement involved in this case, upon the validity of which the defense of the defendants in that case depended, among other things, said:

> "If such an agreement is lawful, then it must be conceded that the defendants are entitled to set it up as a defense to the action; forasmuch as they allege that what they did was in accordance with its terms.

In the general consideration of the subject, it must be premised that the organization, or the co-operation of the workingmen is not against any public policy. Indeed, it must be regarded as having the sanction of law, when it is for such legitimate purposes as that of obtaining an advance in the rate of wages or compensation, or of maintaining such rate; Pen Code. Sec. 170. It is proper and praise-worthy, and, perhaps, falls within that general view of human society which perceives an underlying law that men should unite to achieve that which each by himself cannot achieve, or can achieve less readily.

* * * * * * *

Every citizen is deeply interested in the strict maintenance of the constitutional right freely to pursue a lawful vocation under conditions equal as to all, and to enjoy the fruits of his labor without the imposition of any conditions not required for the general welfare of the community. The candid mind should shrink from the results of the operation of the principle contended for here; for there would certainly be a compulsion, or a fettering, of the individual, glaringly at variance with that freedom in the pursuit of happiness which is believed to be guaranteed to all by the provisions of the fundamental law of the state. The sympathies, or the fellow feeling which, as a social principle, underlies the association of workingmen for their common benefit, are not consistent with a purpose to oppress the individual who prefers by single effort to gain his livelihood."

The court then held that this contract is contrary to public policy, and that the defense predicated upon it could not be sustained.

The case of Jacobs v. Cohen, (decided in 1905) 183 N. Y. 207, 76 N. E. 5, 111 Am. St. Rep. 730, upheld the validity of a contract wherein an employer of labor bound himself to employ and retain only members in good standing in a single labor union, and the court enforced a note given as collateral security for the performance of the contract, to be applied as liquidated damages for its violation. But this decision was rendered by a divided court.

In Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 74 N. E. 603, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, it appears that the contract was entered into between the Boot and Shoe Workers Union and the firm of Goodrich and Company, the second clause of which is as follows:

> "In consideration of the foregoing valuable privileges, the employer agrees to hire as shoe workers only members of the Boot and Shoe Workers' Union, in good standing, and further agrees not to retain any shoe worker in his employment after receiving notice from the union that such shoe worker is objectionable to the union, either on account of being in arrears for dues, or disobedience of union rules or laws, or from any other cause."

An action was brought against the defendant representing the union for inducing Goodrich and Company to discharge the plaintiff, who was objectionable to the union because of his alleged arrears for dues.

At the close of the evidence the defendant offered an instruction assuming that the contract above referred to was a valid one, and that the defendant, as the representative of the Boot and Shoe Workers' Union, was justified in insisting upon an observance of its terms. The court declined to give this instruction, to which the defendant excepted, and these exceptions were overruled by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

In Breman v. United Hatters of North America, (decided in 1906) 73 N. J. L. 729,65 Atl, 165, it was said that the lawfulness of an agreement between the union and the manufacturing hatters in all the factories throughout an extensive district, to the effect that none but members of the association should be employed in their shops, admitted of question; but no adjudication in respect thereto was made, because it was not necessary to a decision of the case.

In Connors v. Connolly, decided in 1913 by the Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, reported in 86 Atl. 600, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 564, 86 Conn. 641, the fourth point of the syllabus is thus stated:

> "An agreement between a labor union and employers, which provides that the latter shall not employ non-union laborers, is contrary to public policy, where the agreement embraces an entire industry of any considerable proportions in the community, so that it will operate generally in that community to prevent or to seriously deter craftsmen from working at their trade under favorable conditions without joining a union."

The eighth point in the syllabus in this case states the law with reference to contracts of the character of the one under consideration, in this language:

> "The question whether a contract or combination is contrary to public policy must be settled by a consideration of the contract or combination itself to learn what it threatens and what its evil tendencies are, and what possibilities of harm to the general welfare lie within it; and an instruction that a contract or combination must be judged by the results which come from it is erroneous."

In A. R. Barnes & Co. v. Berry, 156 Fed. 72, decided in 1907, the following is the language of the fourth point in the syllabus:

> "A demand by laborers for a 'closed shop', or that no person not a member of their union, be employed therein, was contrary to public policy."

It will be seen from an examination of these cases, that the courts hold that it is unlawful for a labor organization to enter into a contract with an employer whereby he is to employ no person except union laborers. This seems to be the trend of most of the decisions of the courts, so far as the subject has been before them for consideration.

Now if it is not lawful,—if it is contrary to public policy,—for members of a labor union to make a contract with an employer to engage in his service only members of such union, the same principle must obtain when non-union employes severally make contracts with an employer whereby none but non-union employes are to be engaged, and whereby the employer obligates himself only to employ persons who are not members of a labor organization.

The theory or principle upon which the courts proceed in cases of this sort is that it has a tendency to exclude a large number of citizens seeking employment, and who must necessarily labor to sustain themselves and families, from obtaining employment, and further must necessarily tend to create a monopoly confined only to that class of emyloyes who, for personal reasons, have not connected themselves with a labor union. If contracts like the one sought to be enforced here by the petitioner are upheld, two results must necessarily follow therefrom: (a) All of the 12,500 union miners living in Sub-District 5 will be thrown out of employment by the extension of such a contract to the other counties composing the sub district, unless they remove therefrom. (b) It would result ultimately in the destruction of the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America, the purposes of which are fully expressed in the preamble of the Constitution of District 6, in which and under the jurisdiction of which Sub-District 5 is operated.

Whether a contract is contrary to public policy must not be judged by the results in the particular case, but by a consideration of the possibilities of harm that lie within it to the general public, as stated above, quoting from the decision in Connors v. Connolly, supra.

The upholding of the contract sought to be enforced by the petitioner in this case would not only drive out of employment the 12,500 men in Sub-District 5, but the nearly 40,000 men in the State of Ohio, and the now over 300,000, as shown by the evidence, belonging to the United Mine Workers of America throughout the United States. Under circumstances like this, can the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company come into a court of equity, and charge the United Mine Workers of America with an andeavor to create a monopoly through the agency of their organization, when they themselves are endeavoring to fix a precedent whereby no man in the whole country can be employed in the business of mining coal, if he belongs to the United Mine Workers of America? He who comes into equity must come with clean hands; and he who asks equity must do equity.

Respondents Did Not Have Notice of the Contract.

Another question arising in reference to the contract is, if the said contract existing between petitioner and its employes is valid, did respondents, before and at the time of the institution of this suit, have notice of its existence and its terms?

The petitioner alleges that they did have notice of this contract, (Record p. 16) but the answers of the respondents deny that they had knowledge of this contract and its terms. (Record pp. 58, 73).

All that appears in the record, so far as we have been able to ascertain, is that which appears in the testimony of E. C. Pickett at pages 306, 307. This evidence relates to a conversation with the unserved defendant Hughes, and the witness said, in speaking of the employes of the petitioner: "That they knew the conditions under which they were working, and that they did not have to quit; that we did not force them to join the union; that we asked them not to and they agreed not to join."

On the cross-examination of the witness Pickett, being then interrogated touching his conversation with the said Hughes, the witness, in speaking of the Glendale Coal Company's employes, says: "That they were not to join the United Mine Workers. If they wanted to, though, they would have to cease their employment with the Glendale Coal Company." (Record page 310).

We have examined this record and we are unable to find any testimony bringing home to these respondents a knowledge of the alleged fact that the petitioner made a contract with each one of its employes, whereby each one agreed not to become a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and that if the petitioner's employes did become members of the United Mine Workers, then their employment with it was to cease and thereby be at an end.

It is not denied, and even admitted, in the answer of the respondents, that the petitioner is operating a non-union mine, but this is very different from the proposition that it has contracted with each of its men uot to become members of the United Mine Workers, and upon doing so their employment ceases.

The petitioner makes knowledge of this contract and its terms an essential condition to that feature of the injunction inhibiting the respondents from doing anything to solicit or induce its employes to become members of the United Mine Workers of America. It is upon this theory that the petitioner asked the court to award an injunction prohibiting the use of persuasion or any other unlawful means to solicit or induce the employes to become members of this labor organization. This part of the bill is positively denied by the answers of all of the respondents, and there is no proof to sustain it.

It is true that the witness Koch says in his testimony (Record pp. 358, 359) that he told the officials about the contract with the men of the petitioner, but on turning to another part of the record (p. 355) we find that the conversation that he had with the district official Green and the sub-district officials Watkins and Zelenka was about July 1, 1907.

We also find from the testimony of the witness Cotts, that beginning with June 6, 1906, all contracts with the employes of petitioner up to January 1, 1908, were verbal and that the mine superintendent Pickett employed the miners that work for petitioner and that witness' (Cotts) information as to the contracts not in writing is quite general and indefinite. (Record pp. 296, 297).

Now if we turn to the testimony of the mine superintendent who did the employing of the men, we shall see just what the agreement was between the petitioner and its employees. (Record p 304).

The witness here says in his examination in chief, and which he does not modify on cross examination:

> Q. State as nearly as you can recollect just what you did and what you said when you came to employ a man?
> A. Any man that made application for employment, I told him personally the conditions under which we were working and explained it to him.

I told him that we were paying the price which had been demanded by the union and were paying as much as anybody else, but the mine was run non-union and it would continue to run non-union; that the company would not recognize the United Mine Workers of America, but if they (these men) wanted to work under these conditions it was perfectly satisfactory with me, and, if not, why I did not want them to accept of the position at all And every man that went to work there expressed himself saying it was satisfactory to him to work under these conditions; that all they wanted was the price; that is, that they wanted to be paid for their work the same as other people.

Q. What, if anything, was said on the subject of their membership in the union if they wanted to continue working at your mine?

A. I also told them that any man who wanted to become a member of the United Mine Workers —that that was his business—but he could not be a member of the United Mine Workers and be affiliated with the United Mine Workers and be under the employ of the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, or be under the jurisdiction of the United Mine Workers; that the mine was run non-union so far as the United Mine Workers of America were concerned.

We now ask how the witness (Koch) could inform the respondents Green, Watkins and Zelenka on or about July 1, 1907 of a contract which did not then exist? Of course he could not give them this information. The statement taken from the testimony of the witness Pickett, as quoted above, does not show any agreement on the part of the employees not to join the United Mine Workers. It simply shows that the petitioner through its mine superintendent was only employing, and only employed, non union labor. In the terms or conditions of employment it nowhere appears, that prior to January 1, 1908, the employees agreed with the petitioner not to become members of the United Mine Workers of America; and this suit was instituted on the twenty-fourth day of October, 1907.

It was, therefore, impossible for the respondents or any of them prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit to have knowledge of a contract and its terms which had not then been made and was not in existence.

The conclusion is irresistible, therefore, that the respondents did not know of this contract or its terms prior to or at the time this injunction was awarded. Upon what principle of law or equity can the petitioner predicate its right to an injunction restraining the respondents at the time this suit was instituted, from persuading its employes to become members of their labor organization? They knew nothing whatever of the fact upon which the petitioner based its application for an injunction with reference to this phase of the bill.

Operation of the Petitioner's Contract With its Employes.

It is a general rule of elementary law that a contract neither imposes liabilities nor confers rights on a person not a party to it. There is an exception to this rule which will be noticed further on in this brief.

The contract here is not for a definite term of employment. It is an employment at the will of either party.

The agreement in substance is that "I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America and will not become so while an employe of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company * * * * * * * If I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America I agree to withdraw from the employment of said Company."

This contract is a mere option as to the employe to work for the petitioner or not at the will of the employe.

If the employe does join the Union, the contract set forth in the bill (Record p. 5) provides

> "he could" (can) work no longer for the company."

This provision, just quoted, does not appear in the written contract made with the employes after the institution of the suit and which became effective on January 1, 1908.

Under either contract the petitioner can discharge its men at any time, without cause, and the men may quit its employment at any time without any reason therefor.

The employes know that under the contract set out in the bill, if they join the Union they must quit the petitioner's employment, unless the petitioner consent to their further service of it.

It is with the petitioner to continue the men in its employ, if they do join the Union, and if all the men in its employ should become members of the Union and still continue to work for petitioner, its mine could not then be a Union mine. As we shall presently see, all the men may belong to the Union, and the mine still not be a union mine.

It is one thing to employ union men to work in a mine and quite another thing to unionize the mine.

An employe under this contract is invited to join the United Mine Workers of America and the reasons and argument are presented to him on the part of the Union why it would be better for him to join. The employe is at liberty to join the Union or not as he may determine. If he does join the Union under such circumstances, does this act amount to anything more than a conclusion on his part to quit the service of the petitioner, which he may lawfully do under this contract? But even then he only ceases to work because his employer compels him to do so.

> The charge in the bill is that the repondents
> "have agreed, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy, under the name of the United Mine Workers of America, to unlawfully persuade, entice and procure your orator's miners or mine workers, employed by your orator and working for your orator in or around your orator's mine, to break, violate and disregard their several contracts with your orator, all with the avowed purpose of compelling your orator to unionize its plant, without your orator's consent, and to such end have unlawfully and maliciously agreed, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy to compel by threats and imtimidation and by other unlawful means your orator's said employees to join the Union."

(Record p. 16)

The bill averring a confederation and conspiracy, to unlawfully entice and procure petitioner's miners to violate their several contracts, and the answers positively denying such allegation, petitioner has taken upon itself the burden of proving such allegation, which it has wholly failed to do.

There is no evidence at all of any combination or conspiracy formed for the purpose of inducing the petitioner's employes to join the Union and thereby bring about the violation of the contracts with petitioner as alledged.

Proof must be confined to the pleadings, and evidence outside of the issues raised by the pleadings is immaterial, and will not be considered by the court.

This rule obtains both at law and in equity. Any other rule would be subversive of the administration of justice.

If the respondents knew of this contract and its terms when this suit was brought, can they be enjoined from soliciting the employes to become members of said labor organization in the absence of fraud, intimidation, violence or compulsion? It seems to us that the decision of this question is hardly necessary for the determination of this case, but for the sake of the argument let us briefly examine it.

This contract was made between the petitioner and its employes without the privity of the United Mine Workers. It was made in utter disregard of their rights to take lawful steps to promote the growth of their organization. Indeed, it was made for the express purpose of antagonizing the United Mine Workers, and actually to prevent them from obtaining employment with the petitioner, and from any other coal operator who might choose to enter into a like contract with his miners. It was done for the further purpose of driving all members of the United Mine Workers, if possible to uphold this agreement, from mining coal in the State of West Virginia, so that the many thousands of coal miners in West Virginia who belong to this organization would be compelled to seek employment elsewhere, or else give up membership in their organization. It is, in fact, but an introduction to that open antagonism which in the last few years has so clearly manifested itself on the part of some coal operators in West Virginia against the employment of organized labor, and especially of entering into contract relations with the United Mine Workers of America as an organization, and thereby recognizing them as an organized body of workers. It is but a manifestation of the antipathy of the coal operators in some parts of West Virginia against the policy of collective contracts between them and their employes. The operator knows that if he deals with his men as individuals and not as members of an organization, that he is in a situation to dictate terms as to wages, hours of work and conditions that he would be wholly unable to do if his contracts were made collectively with the respresentatives of this class of labor organizations.

This contract does not provide for a definite term of employment at a fixed scale of wages. It has but one binding obligation in it, and that is if any employe becomes a member of the United Mine Workers, his employment thereby and at once ceases; and in consideration of that promise on the part of the employe, the operator agrees to run his mine non-union; thus making his desire and his own policy the consideration for the miners promise.

The petitioner alleges that in June, 1906, it decided to run non-union; that is, it decided to employ no one belonging to the United Mine Workers of America, and then contract with them collectively for a definite period and upon an greed scale of wages. Then, after determining upon this policy, it contracts with each one of its coal miners that if he will not become a member of the United Mine Workers, it (petitioner) will adhere to this policy of non-unionism previously adopted by it; so that it thereby forms a combination or conspiracy with each of the employes to antagonize the members of the United Mine Workers, and the organization to which they belong. Can it be anything else than this? The contract then becomes a cunning device on the part of the managers of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company to enlist under its banner of exclusion from its mines members of the United Mine Workers, all persons who will come into its mine and aid and assist in carrying out this policy; and if any employe refuses to continue in the conspiracy he is to quit the mine and find employment elsewhere; and if any member of the organization comes upon the premises of the petitioner or visits its co conspirators for the purpose of a friendly and peaceable conversation, or gives notice to any of these employes of his intention to discuss the policy of this labor organization, or attempts in a quiet and peaceable manner to present its advantages, he is charged with being in conspiracy with all the other members of the United Mine Workers of America, not only those composing Sub-District 5 and District 6, but of the national organization, also, to induce, persuade and entice the petitioner's employes to break this combination, which the petitioner calls a contract, and for the lawful purpose, too, of endeavoring to build up the organization by increasing its numerical strength and thereby enabling its members to more effectually promote the purposes of this labor organization.

That this so called agreement or contract, which in effect is a combination between the petitioner and its employes for the purpose of preventing members of the United Mine Workers of America from finding employment in the mining industry of West Virginia, has for its object a mere antagonism to the union, attention is directed to the testimony of one of the principal witnesses of the petitioner at pages 361-363, wherein the witness describes the method of operating a mine under a contract between the owner and the representatives of the United Mine Workers of America, which is detailed on pages 362, 363; and after setting forth these methods, the witness is then examined as follows:

"Q. When a mine is run non-union what does that mean? What do you understand by that, Mr. Daugherty?

A. Well, I have not worked at very many non-union mines. The one I am working at now is run on the same basis that it was when the United Mine Workers were in power there.

Q. Is it a non-union mine?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, you say that it was run pretty nearly on the same basis, did you say, as the others?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What do you mean by saying 'It is run pretty nearly on the same basis as the others?'

A. I mean that we get the same price for our labor; we have the same conditions that are met in the same way; we have a committee and if we have any grievances we take it up under the same style as we did when we were in the United Mine Workers.

Q. You are practically continuing the same operations that you had when you were a part of the United Mine Workers?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then, is there any complaint to you people from the company on account of continuing that system?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Now, if you are continuing just as you did before, what difference can you find in the matter of running non-union and running union in the conditions and methods of doing business at the Hitchman mine?

A. Well, one method is, since we have been running non-union we have never had any trouble of any kind and the mine has never been stopped.

Q. You mean when you have been running non union you have been running continuously?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And when you ran union you had some strikes?

A. Yes, sir.

Q Is that practically the only difference between the two conditions the one that prevailed when you had the union and the one that prevailed when you have no union?

A. Well, there may be some little difference.

Q. There may be some little difference. Now, what would you say that consists in.

A. Well, it consists in this: That whenever we run out of an agreement we have the power to make our own agreement and go ahead and work. As it was before we had to wait for the officials to make it.

Q. You meet now and among yourselves you make an agreement. Haven't you been running at practically the same price all the time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then you have had no agreement to make as to your scale of wages since you started to run non-union? Is that right?

A. Yes, sir; there have been agreements made since then.

Q. Was the scale lowered or raised?

A. Well, the scale was—whatever the United Mine Workers' scale paid that is what we got.

Q. Then it was consented to by the operator and he was just conforming to the scale of the United Mine Workers?

A. He was just to pay the scale, yes, sir; whatever it was.

Q. And then also as to the conditions prescribed by the United Mine Workers?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. About the only difference now and when you ran union is that you don't have the advice of the officers of the United Mine Workers, whereas before you did have it. Is that right?

A. That is right."

(Record pp. 363, 346).

Thus, we perceive from this testimony, that after this combination between the petitioner and its employes was entered into to drive out union labor, that the petitioner continued to pay the same price for labor, conditions were met in the same way, grievances were adjusted in the same way, and it was practically continuing the same operations that existed at its mine when it operated on a union basis When the scale of wages was lowered or raised by the United Mine Workers, it paid the same scale, and it made contracts with its employes at all times so as to conform its prices to that paid to members of the United Mine Workers under the scale adopted by this organization. What, then, could be the object of this combination between the petitioner and its men, if it were not for the purpose of fighting the union, driving it out of the State of West Virginia, if possible, and doing all in its power to make it impossible, by the law of this State, for union labor to exist in it, and at the same time work in its coal mines?

The petitioner, after determining to drive from its mines every member of organized labor, then addressed itself to each individual, who must not belong to a labor organization, and by its artful agreement or combination which it denominates a contract, took each employe into this agreement or combination for the purpose of co-operating with and aiding it in keeping any part of the United Mine Workers of America from finding employment in its mines, entered into the same agreement or combination with every other mine over which it had any control, to do the same thing, and then when it was endeavoring to carry into effect this agreement or combination for the overthrow of every union employe and the organization to which he belongs, appeals to a court of equity and prays the court to protect it and its co-conspirators in the destruction of organized labor, and further asks that the labor organization which it is antaganizing may be declared illegal and void, on the ground that it is in violation of the constitution and common and statutory law of the state.

Will the court by its decree, sanction and uphold an agreement or combination to destroy organized labor, and then in the furtherance of this purpose actually enter a decree declaring another organization, which all the courts practically hold to be lawful, to be unlawful and contrary to the constitution and common and statutory law of West Virginia? To ask this question is to answer it in the negative.

We insist, and we will be able clearly to show, that the United Mine Workers are a lawful labor organization. But while this is true, if we concede for argument's sake that it is not lawful, even then, will the court lend its aid to uphold the petitioner in its combination with hundreds of other men to drive out of employment members of this organization simply because they are members? It seems to us to ask this question, is also to answer it in the negative.

May we not, therefore, justly conclude, that even if the respondents did know (though, as we have shown, they did not know) of the existence of this agreement or combination called a contract, they have the same right to seek to have their members work in the mines of the petitioner as it has to call hundreds of others to its aid as parties to this agreement or combination to keep them from obtaining this employment; provided, however, that they do not use fraud, force, intimidation or violence to attain this purpose?

The Circuit Court of Appeals in holding that the respondents cannot be enjoined from using lawful methods to invite or induce petitioner's employes to become members of the United Mine Workers, and after quoting this contract, said:

> "It will be observed that by the terms of this contract that either of the parties thereto may at will terminate the same, and while it is provided that so long as the employe continues to work for the plaintiff he shall not join this organization, nevertheless there is nothing in the contract which requires such employes to work for any fixed or definite period. If at any time after employment any of them should decide to join the defendant organization, the plaintiff could not under the contract recover damges for a breach of the same. In other words, the employes under this contract, if they deem proper may, at any moment join a labor union, and the only penalty provided therefor is that they cannot secure further employment from the plaintiff. Therefore, under this contract, if the non union men, or any of them, should see fit to join the United Mine Workers of America on account of lawful and persuasive methods on the part of the defendants, and as a result of such action on their part were to be discharged by the plaintiff, it could not maintain an action against them on account of such conduct on their part. Such being the case, it would be unreasonable to hold that the action of the defendants would render the United Mine Workers of America liable in damages to the plaintiff because they had employed lawful methods to induce the nonunion miners to become members of this organization.

Under these circumstances, we fail to see how this contract can be taken as a basis for restraining the defendants from using lawful methods for the purpose of inducing the parties to the contract to join the organization.

This is an age of co-operation through organization. In fact, organization is the only means by which united effort can be secured in any branch of human endeavor. The doctors, dentists, school teachers, wholesale and retail merchants, bankers and manufacturers and in fact every branch of industry in this country, are organized for the purpose of the mutual protection of the respective parties interested. Such being the case, it is just as essential, and perhaps more important, that the laboring people should organize for their advancement and protection, than it is for any of the vocations we have mentioned."

214 Fed. 714, 715.

The petitioner relies greatly upon the Case of Flaccus v. Smith 199 Pa. 128, and in the argument of counsel accompanying its petition considerable space is devoted to this case, to show its application as an authority to the case now before this court.

(Petition pp. 123-127)

The facts in Flaccus v. Smith are very different from those proved in the case how before the court. The facts in that case, as found by White, P. J., before whom the case was tried, as reported in 7 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 557, et. seq. as far as pertains to the inquiry here, were in substance as follows:

1. That in September, 1909, the plaintiff had in its factory eighteen or twenty apprentices; that they were all on written indentures, signed by them or their parents; that by this indenture the apprentices were bound to serve for four years, the plaintiff to teach them the art, occupation or mystery of glass blowing, at the prices stipulated in the indentures and at the times and upon the conditions therein set forth.

2. That on the 13th day of September, 1899, the officer and agent of the American Flint Glass Workers Union called at plaintiff's factory and asked permission to go through the works, falsely representing that he was going to start a glass and bottling works. This request was refused. Afterwards he had gatherings of the workmen and apprentices of the plaintiffs in his own rooms at the hotel over night and persuaded them to join the Union which he represented Among those joining were eleven apprentices, to each of whom was administered an oath and they were then declared to be members of the Union.

3. This officer of the union knew that plaintiff's works were an independent factory, that members of the union were not employed, that its apprentices were bound, in their indentures not to join or become subject to the rules and regulations of any such organizations as the officer represented.

4. The object of the officer representing the union was to break down the plaintiff's factory, and as a part of his scheme there was a written notice served on the plaintiff September 19, signed by sixteen of its employes, eight of whom were apprentices, inspired by the union agent which commenced as follows: "On behalf of the Glass Workers, employes of your bottling works, the undersigned do respectfully submit the following demand." These demands were that on and after Monday, September 25, the prices to be paid for the various kinds of bottles "shall be the same as paid by union houses," that all of the present employes be retained and permitted to join the union; and that all who had been discharged for having joined the union be reinstated.

5. The conduct and actions of this agent of the union were very injurious to the plaintiff in his business and if repeated and persisted in as found by the court would in all probability ruin his business.

It will thus be seen that in the case of Flaccus vs. Smith supra, so much relied upon by counsel for the petitioner, the facts were widely different from those in the case now before this court. There the representative of the union secretly and surreptitiously brought the employes of the plaintiff who were bound to service for a definite term of years into his own room and while there persuaded them to actually join the union, and then and there administered an oath to them and they declared that they were members of the union; that this representative not only knew that they were apprentices but were bound for a definite term of service with certain conditions and specifications as to their compensation and the time and manner of payment, and this representative was endeavoring to have these apprentices violate their articles of apprenticeship; that this agent thereafter inspired these employes to act as union men demanding from their employer that they should be paid union prices, that all the present employes be retained and permitted to join the union and that all that had been discharged for having joined the union be reinstated. Thus actually showing that the agent of the union, with the aid of the plaintiff's employes, were actually attempting to interfere with plaintiff's business and to employ none but members of the union at his works and to even take back those employes whom he had discharged because they had joined the union.

The whole record in the case now before the court is absolutely barren of any overt acts attributable to the United Mine Workers of America in any manner comparable to the acts of the representative of the union in the case under review. That case is not an authority applicable to the case now before the court.

The United Mine Workers of America is a Lawful Labor Union.

The next question pressed by the petitioner for consideration is that of the legality of the United Mine Workers of America as a labor Union.

It is charged in the bill to be an unlawful organization (record pp 6, 24, 25) and denied in the answers. (Record pp. 57, 65, 66, 72, 81.) The constitutions of the national and subordinate organizations are in evidence in this case and, though not copied in full into the record, they are treated as part of the record by the court's decree settling the contents thereof. (Record pp. 704, 707.) These constitutions are designated as "Plaintiff's Documentary Exhibits Nos. 1, 2 and 3," and constitute items numbered 11, 12 and 13 of the said decree settling the contents of the record in this case, (record pp. 705, 706;) and under "Stipulation of Counsel as to Record," (record p. 712) these constitutions were transmitted to the Circuit Court of Appeals and are now before this court. Extended excerpts from them appear in the bill of complaint (record pp. 6 15) and several of their parts are quoted in the opinion of the District Court. (Record pp. 681, 687.)

The learned District Court, in the introductory part of its opinion, proceeds upon the theory that at common law labor combinations or associations, having for their object an advance in wages, a change or decrease of the hours of work, and the many other purposes of these organizations, were unlawful, and that the common law declared such combinations to be conspiracies in restraint of trade. (Record pp. 644-647.) The Court says in its opinion that "for common law conspiracy a number of the members of trades unions were prosecuted for combining to raise wages, and for other declared purposes, and convictions were had." (Record pp. 545, 646.) Preceding this statement in its opinion, at page 645 the court declares that "such parts of the common law and of the State of Virginia as are in force within the boundaries of the State of West Virginia when this constitution" (referring to the first constitution adopted by the state prior to its admission into the union) "goes into operation, and are not repugnant thereto, shall be and continue the law of this state until altered or repealed by the legislature." (Record page 645.) The District Court then states that the same provision was incorporated into the second constitution of the state adopted in 1872.

The same Court, as one of the premises for the conclusion that the United Mine Workers, as a labor organization, is contrary to the constitution and laws of West Virginia, proceeds upon the theory that they were unlawful at common law, and that where the common law has not been altered in West Virginia, that, therefore, labor organizations in that State are unlawful unless permitted and authorized by modification or abrogation of the common law by the statutory law of the state.

Labor Unions Not Unlawful at Common Law.

A careful examination of the subject satisfies us that labor unions at common law were not unlawful, and were only made so in England by virtue of acts of Parliament.

A recent author of recognized standing, writing on the subject of combinations, discussing the English cases, says:

> "There seems to have been no rule of the common law against combinations of working-men, except where such combinations were either of a criminal character or directly against some statutory provision.
>
> There are some dicta to the effect that such combinations would be unlawful, and 'some traces may be found in the ancient books of a doctrine that it is criminal for one man, independently of a combination, to oblige another, by bond or otherwise, to abstain from the exercise of his proper craft or employment. 'But even such bond has no direct relation to a combination; its legality or illegality rests upon considerations entirely foreign to those which control the validity of a combination.
>
> It is stated by an eminent authority that no case was ever cited prior to the year 1825, in which any person was convicted for a conspiracy in restraint of trade at common law for having combined with others for the raising of wages."

1 Eddy on Combinations, §§ 404, 405.

This same author, quoting from Wright, Crim. Consp. p. 43, appends the following note to the text under §404:

"The text-books, down to at least 1800, appear to be silent as to the existence of any doctrine of the criminality at common law of combinations of masters or workmen. Neither in the earlier editions of Hawkins nor in East does the doctrine in question appear to be stated. So in the edition of Burn's Justice of 1810, it is not mentioned under the title 'Conspiracy' and under the title 'Servants' there are several statements of the statutes against combination, but there is no reference to common law. The various acts against combinations for controlling masters or workmen which were passed in the eighteenth century, (1725, 12 Geo. 1, ch. 34, extended by 1729, 22 Geo. 2, ch. 27, 12; 1799, 39 Geo. 3, ch. 81; 1800. 39 & 40 Geo. 3, ch. 106, etc.) commence by declaring or enacting agreements for such purposes theretofore made to be 'illegal, null and void,' which would not have been necessary if they had been thought to be criminal at common law; and they then proceed by independent enactments to make it punishable in the future to engage in them.

The result of the whole appears to be that there is not sufficient authority for concluding that before the close of the eighteenth century there was supposed to be any rule of common law that combinations for controlling masters or workmen were criminal, except where the combination was for some purpose punishable under a statute expressly directed against such combinations, or was for conduct punishable independently of combination."

To that part of the text of this author in which he says "There are some dicta to the effect that such combinations would be unlawful" (at common law), the following note is appended:

"The most important of these is the dictum of Grosse, J., in R. v. Wawbey, 6 T. R.: 'In many cases an agreement to do a certain thing has been considered as the subject of an indictment for a conspiracy, though the same act, if done separately by each individual, without any agreement among themselves, would not have been illegal. As in the case of journey-men conspiring to raise their wages, each may insist on raising his wages, if he can; but if several meet for the same purpose it is illegal, and the parties may be indicted for a conspiracy.' 'This dictum is an illustration not necessary to the decision of R. v. Mawbey, and founded, as it seems to me, upon the case of the 'Cambridge tailors.'

Justice Stephens, speaking of the common law, further says: 'I must add that I am quite unable to understand why, if all combinations to raise wages were at common law indictable conspira cies, it should have been considered necessary to pass the long series of acts already referred to. These acts are not in their form declaratory, nor do they even assume that contracts between workmen for the purpose of raising their wages are illegal in the sense of being void and so incapable of being enforced by law. On the contrary they enact that they shall be void. Sir W. Erle observes that whilst the ancient statutes (p. 37) 'were in force they tended to prevent a resort to the common law remedy for conspiracy ' The inference from the existence of the statutes appears to me to be that until they were passed the conduct which they punished was not criminal."

This same author, Eddy on Combinations, cites as authority for the statement that no case was ever cited prior to the year 1825, in which any person was convicted for a conspiracy in restraint of trade at common law, Stephen, Hist Crim Law, vol. III, page 209. If this be true, it almost irresistibly follows that this subject in England was regulated by Act of Parliament, dating from the middle of the fourteenth century.

The Court is referred to what is said in the opinion of the Court of Appeals of New York in National Protective Association v. Cumming, 170 N Y., 315, 63 N. E. 369, 88 Am. St. Rep. 648, and especially at page 658. This case necessarily involved the legality of a labor union, and in upholding its legality, the court makes this observation in the course of its opinion:

"But it seems not out of place to suggest that the decisions of the English courts upon questions affecting the rights of workman ought, at least, to be received with caution, in view of the fact that the later ones are largely supported by early precedents which are entirely consistent with the policy of the statute law of England, but are hostile not only to the statute law of this country, but to the spirit of our institutions. In support of this view reference to a few early statutes of England will be made."

The court mentions particularly the early statutes of England, beginning with the ones passed in 1349 and 1350, (23 Edw. III and 25 Edw. III, st.) requiring laborers to serve employers when demanded by the latter to do so, inflicting punishment for a refusal, regulating their wages, and requiring that they swear to obey the provisions of the statutes. Reference is then made to another statute passed in 1548, forbidding all conspiracies and covenants of artificers or laborers to refuse to work at the price fixed by statute, and imposing heavy penalties and punishments. Then the statute of 1563 is noticed, which compels all persons able to work, not possessed of independent means, upon demand so to do. This statute fixes the hours of work; lays down elaborate rules as to apprenticeship; and was not repealed until 1875. The court also refers to the act passed in 1720, declaring all agreements between journeymen tailors for advancing their wages, or for lessening their hours of work, to be null and void, and subjecting them to heavy penalties and punishments for disobeying this statute. The opinion also states that similar acts were passed as to employes in other manufactures and trades. Another act passed in 1800 (40 Geo. III, c. 60,) is referred to in the opinion, providing a penalty of three months imprisonment without hard labor, or two months imprisonment with hard labor, for every journeyman workman or other person "who enters into any combination to obtain an advance of wages or lessen or alter the hours of work."

The court concludes this part of its opinion by declaring: "This statute" (referring to the last named statute) "as well as the others referred to, have at last been swept away, but necessarily their influence has been not inconsiderable in shaping the decisions of the courts of England."

Another author, writing on the Modern Law of Labor Unions, after giving a summary of early English legislation relating to laborers, and reviewing some of the early English decisions, concludes his observations with this statement:

> "The fact should not be overlooked, however, that these combinations were indictable at common law, because the thing conspired to be done was in violation of a general statute fixing the rate of wages for laborers and of a large branch of trade affecting the comfort and interest of the public. In a recent article in the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure it is said, (and the proposition is supported by ample authority,) that it is elementary law that a conspiracy to commit a crime, whether the grade be that of a felony or misdemeanor, is an indictable offense, and that this is true whether the act agreed to be done is an offense at common law or is made so by statute. It is essential to bear this principle in mind in determining what the common law rule as to combinations of workmen is in the United States, for unless the statutes mentioned were adopted as a part of the common law, any claim that the common law of a particular state makes it an indictable offense for workmen to combine to raise wages is altogether without foundation."

Martin, Modern Law of Labor Unions, §3.

It will thus be observed that the common law of England does not throw much light on the legal phase of labor unions, because of the early legislation introduced into that country absolutely restrictive of the rights and freedom of labor, incident to a social condition of which we have no practical knowledge or experience. In the formation or evolution of the doctrines of the common law, there were no conditions calling into existence labor unions. Social conditions were such that their creation would have been next to the impossible, and had they been formed, would have been absolutely useless.

To show that a "labor union" or "trade union" was unknown to the early common law, it need only be observed that no mention of such an association is made in "Pollock and Maitland's History of English Law, prior to the reign of Edward I, 1272-1307."

No mention of such an institution is made in all the voluminous works of Edmund Burke.

The influence of legislation with reference to this subject must have been all powerful in moulding the decisions of the courts involving questions of labor.

Speaking of the English Acts of Parliament passed in 1349 and 1350 (23 Edw. III and 25 Edw. III, st. 1), Hume, in his History of England, volume 2, page 275, says:

> "The parliament attempted the impractical scheme of reducing the price of labor after the pestilence, and also that of poultry. A reaper, in the first week of August, was not allowed above twopence a day, or near sixpence of our present money; and in the second week, a third more. A master carpenter was limited through the whole year to threepence a day, a common carpenter to twopence, money of that age. It is remarkable that, in the same reign, the pay of a common soldier, an archer, was sixpence a day; which, by the change both in denomination and value, would be equivalent to near five shillings of our present money. Soldiers were then listed only for a short time; they lived idle all the rest of the year, and commonly all the rest of their lives; one successful campaign, was supposed to be a small fortune to a man; which was a great allurement to enter the service."

The great industrial changes which have taken place in England, this country and elsewhere, have given rise to problems with reference to labor which were utterly unknown and unimagined a few generations ago. These problems have resulted from what is commonly called the "Industrial Revolution," but this is only one of the revolutions which we have noticed in the world's history.

> "Organizations of wage earners are instrumentalities which have arisen out of the complexity and confusion incidental to the industrial changes of the nineteenth century. * * * As long as the workers owned the tools with which they worked, or owned both the tools and the product of their labor, the worker was not a wage earner. Before the modern trade union could arise, the cleavage between employer and em ployee, between capitalist and wage earner, must become quite distinct. The rise of unionism is coincident with a horizontal cleavage within what had been one industrial class. With the growth of the factory system the cost of the tools and machinery and of the workshop increased; and, consequently, the line of demarkation between employer and employed grew more distinct. Unions appeared before the factory became an important industrial factor; but the factory is primarily responsible for the wide-spread and coherent form of modern labor organizations. The increasing use of machinery and of natural forces in maufacturing and transportation multiplied the amount of capital necessary to efficiently carry on any industrial enterprise. This circumstance still further widened the breach between the employer and his employee, and reduced the capillarity of the wage-earning class."

Carlton, History and Problems of Organized Labor.

The modern English statutes extending the rights and the privileges of Trades Unions is only a reflex of the liberal and progressive spirit which has developed in that country, and which only followed that which existed with reference to labor organizations in this country.

The trade union in England, in the furtherance of its objects may do everything to accomplish these objects which does not amount to force, fraud or coercion It is gratifying to know that a great government like the British Empire has caught the modern progressive spirit relating to the rights of the laboring man and has breathed it into her laws and that the judges, whose duty it is to consider and administer these laws, are imbued, in the discharge of their high duties, with the same spirit. Can the American people and the American judges fall below this high plane and do nothing in the promotion, in so liberal a government as ours, of the rights and interests of the laboring-man in his commendable struggle to achieve better conditions for himself, and thus raise the standard of his citizenship and that of his family dependent upon him? We are now passing through a great social and industrial revolution—a struggle between employes and employer—a man who is dependent and him who is independent—and in this struggle the courts may do much to settle these affiairs upon a just and permanent basis—a basis which must be reached if we expect to achieve the true ends of government and to make our people generally prosperous and happy—the only thing that can allay their discontent and unrest now abroad in the land—and in this work the court must take, in the very nature of things, a prominent and fixed part.

The Common Law of West Virginia is only that part of this great body of the law applicable to the habits and conditions of society and in harmony with the genius, spirit and objects of our institutions.

An examination of the many cases, Federal and State, will disclose that where the common law has been recognized or adopted as a part of the law of a State it is only so much and such parts thereof as are applicable to the condition of our people and in harmony with their genius and progress.

"Although by the terms of the ordinance of 1776, the common law was adopted generally and without a qualification similar to that annexed to > the adoption of the British statutes, yet it has always been considered that the same principle governs the adoption of the common law, such of its doctrines and principles as are repugnant to the nature and character of our political system, or which the different and varied circumstances of our country render inapplicable to us, are either not in force here, or must be so modified in their application as to adapt them to our condition. It is a reasonable and substantial compliance with the common law, 'whose peculiar beauty is that it adapts itself to the rights of parties under every change of circumstances, rather than a literal one, which is exacted by its adoption."

3 Va. & W. Va. Enc. Dig 19, 20 citing Coleman v. Moody, 4 Hen. & M. 20, 21; Findlay v. Smith, 6 Munf. 148; Sout v. Jackson, 2 Rand. 147; Stokes v. Upper Appomattox Co., 3 Leigh 337; Foster v. Com., 96 Va. 309, 31 S. E. 503; Lightfoot v. Colgin, 5 Munf. 42; Thornton v. Smith, 1 Wash. 83.

The books abound in many illustrations of this principle, among which may be noticed the following: Thus what constituted waste at common law does not constitute waste in this State, as the law of waste in its application here must be accommodated to the circumstances of our own country.

Findlay v. Smith, 6 Munf. (Va.) 134: McDodrill v. Pardee & Curtin Lumber Co., 40 W. Va. at page 579, citing approvingly Findlay v. Smith.

So the common law doctrine of ancient lights is inapplicable to the condition of a growing country such as ours, and is not in force here.

Tunstall v. Christian, 80 Va. at page 4.

So the common law rule that the occupant of lands may set spring guns or other mischievous weapons on his premises, and if the same cause death to a trespasser, the owner of the land is not guilty of an offence, is not law in this country.

Sampson v. State, 31 Am. Rep. 1, and especially at page 7.

In this case the Supreme Court of Alabama after citing approvingly Van Ness v. Pacard, 2 Pet. 144, says,

> "This court has frequently said that (in speaking of the common law) in this State, only its general principles, which are adapted to our situation, and not inconsistent with our policy, legislation and institutions are of force and approved."

In Reno Smelting Works v. Stephenson, 20 Nev. 269, 19 Am. State Reports, 364, it is held that the common law doctrine of riparian rights is inapplicable to the physical condition of the Pacific States. The court in the course of its opinion, referring to the statute of Nevada adopting the common law, says:

> "The statute is as follows: 'The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to or in conflict with the constitution and laws of the United States, or the constitution and laws of this state, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of this state:' Gen. Stats. 3021. This was substantially the statute when Nansuckle v. Haines, 7 Nev. 249, was decided. The statute is silent upon the subject of the applicability of the common law, but we think the term 'common law of England' was employed in the sense in which it is generally understood in this country, and that the intention of the legislature was to adopt only so much of it as was applicable to our conditions. An examination of the authorities will render this apparent.
> In Curtis's Commentaries, section 16, the author says: 'It is to be observed that the common law of England was adopted by the founders of the American colonies to a limited extent only. The emigrants from England brought with them the general principles of the common law of that country, and adopted and put them in practice, so far as they were applicable to their situation; and as the people of each colony acted independently of the rest in this respect, it has resulted that the common law of each of the states differs in some particulars from that of the others, and that in none of them is it wholly identical with the common law of England.' Professor Washburn in his treatise upon the law of real property (vol. 1, 36,) says: 'It may be well to understand how far > the common and statute law of England have been adopted as the law of this country. As a general proposition, so much of these as was suited to the condition of a people like that of the earlier settlers of this country was adopted by common consent as the original common law of the colonies. They brought it with them as they did their language, and regarded it as a heritage of inestimable value, by which their rights of person and property were to be regulated and secured. Especially was this true in regard to the law of real property.' 'The common law of England,' said Judge Story, 'is not to be taken in all respect to be that of America. Our ancestors brought with them its general principles, and claimed it as their birthright, but they brought with them, and adopted, only that portion which was applicable to their situation:' Van Ness v. Pacard, 2 Pet. 144."

The Supreme Court of Mississippi in Vicksburg and Jackson R. R. Co. v. Patton, 31 Miss. 166, 66 Am. Dec. 552, holding that the rule of the common law that the owner of cattle is bound to keep them within his enclosures is not applicable to the condition and circumstances of the people of Mississippi, in the course of its opinion at page 561 of 66 Am. Dec. uses this language:

> "It cannot be denied that the common law of England is the law of this State only so far as it is adapted to our institutions and the circumstances of the people and it is not repealed by statutes or varied by usages which by long custom have superseded it; and that where the reason of it ceases the rule itself is inapplicable."

So in Martin v. Bigelow, 16 Am. Dec. (Vt.) 696, the court held that the common law rule as to water rights as to each owner of the land through which a stream of water flows, being entitled to have it flow in its natural course without any diversion of it whatever or use of it by another, is inapplicable to our circumstances and not of binding force.

In Shiveley v. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 52, 38 Law. Ed. at page 350, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking of the extent of the adoption of the common law in this country, says:

> "The settlers of Oregon, like the colonies of the Atlantic States, going from a country in which the common law prevails to one that had no organized government, took with them as their birthright the principles of the common law, as far as suited to their condition in their new home."

The court then stating that the jurisprudence of Oregon is based on the common law cites several cases in support of the principle contained in the quotations above made.

The learned Circuit Court of Appeals that decided this case, after considering the question whether labor unions were unlawful at common law, concluding the whole matter, speaking through Pritchard, Circuit J., quoting from high authority, said:

> "The result of the whole appears to be that there is not sufficient authority for concluding that before the close of the eighteenth century there was supposed to be any rule of common law that combinations for controlling masters or workmen were criminal, except where the combination was for some purpose punishable under a statute expressly directed against such combinations, or was for conduct punishable independently of combination.'
> "However, assuming it to be true that at the time the common law was incorporated as a part of the law of West Virginia, labor unions formed for the purpose of securing a higher rate of wages were held at common law by the English Courts to be a criminal conspiracy, yet we do not consider the same as now binding upon our courts, in view of the changed conditions in this, as well as other countries, incident to industrial development."

And the same learned Court in the course of its opinion said:

> " * * * And it is no crime for any number of persons, without an unlawful object in view, to associate themselves together and agree that they will not work for or deal with certain men or classes of men, or work under a certain price, or without certain conditions. Commonwealth v. Hunt, 4 Met., 111; Boston Glass Manufactory v. Binney, 4 Pick., 425; Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499.

"This freedom of labor and business has not always existed. When our ancestors came here, many branches of labor and business were hampered by legal restrictions created by English statutes, and it was a long time before the community fully understood the importance of freedom in this respect Some of our early legislation is of this character. One of the colonial acts, entitled 'An act against oppression punished by fine and imprisonment such indisposed persons as may take the liberty to oppress and wrong their neighbors by taking excessive wages for their work, or unreasonable prices for merchandise or other necessary commodity as may pass from man to man. Anc. Chart., 172. Another required artificers, or handcraftmen to meet to labor, to work by the day for their neighbors, in mowing, reaping of corn and the—inning thereof. Id., 210. Another act regulated the price of bread, Id., 752. Some of our town records show, that under the power to make by-laws the towns fixed the prices of labor, provisions and several articles of merchandise, as late as the time of the revolutionary war. But experience and increasing intelligence led to the abolition of all such restrictions, and to the establishment of freedom for all branches of labor and business, and all persons who have been born and educated here, and are obliged to begin life without property, know that freedom to choose their own occupation and to make their own contracts not only elevates their condition, but secures to skill and industry and economy their appropriate advantages.'

"The growth and development of the common law occurred when property rights were recognized as paramount to personal rights. At that time there was little if any concert of action on the part of the laboring people, owing to their helpless condition, due in the main to their ignorance. Their domination by the land owner and capitalist was absolute in most respects. and as a result they were as helpless as those held in slavery before our great war. Under such circumstances it is no wonder that we have many decisions in the past at common law, as well as the enactment of statutory laws, by virtue of which it was almost a physical impossibility for those who earned their living by honest toil to accomplish, by organized effort, those things necessary to elevate them to a plane where they could assert those rights so essential to their welfare.

"The industrial development of the world within the last half century has been such as to render it necessary for the courts to take a broader and more comprehensive view than formerly of questions pertaining to the relation that capital sustains to labor.

"The first syllabus in the case of Powell v. Sims (5 W. Va., 1,) is in the following language:

'The common law of England is in force in this State only so far as it is in harmony with its institutions, and its principles applicable to the State of the country and the condition of society.'

The following cases are to the same effect: Baylor v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, 9 W. Va., 270; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 1; Tunstall v. Christian, 80 Va., 1."

It necessarily follows not only from authority but as a practical and reasonable proposition that while the common law is in force in West Virginia, it is only those parts of it that are applicable to our condition as a State and not inconsistent with our principles of government and, of course, when not abrogated by statutory or constitutional provision.

In fact, West Virginia, like most of the other states in the union, has taken the common law as the basis of its system of jurisprudence.

As we have already seen, it is highly problematical whether a labor organization or combination was unlawful at common law. So far as our own investigations go, we are inclined to think that the common law was silent on this subject, as the social condition of the people of England was such that they knew nothing of labor organizations.

But suppose it was the common law of England that a labor organization for the purpose of increasing wages and securing more favorable conditions under which a laborer might work, was unlawful, does it follow that that part of the common law is applicable to the habits and conditions of society in this country and in harmony with the spirit and object of our institutions? Must not this principle of the common law, if it ever existed, be received with great modification?

The learned District Court has pronounced this organization unlawful at the common law and is, therefore, an organization forbidden by the constitution and laws of West Virginia. The learned court reaches this conclusion after a very thorough examination and review of the English cases.

He also announces the proposition that the legality of a labor organization must be determined by the laws peculiar to each State. This is true where a particular statute in any state is applicable to the subject; but where the many decisions that have been rendered in the state and federal courts were made they did not depend upon the construction and application of statutes but upon the doctrines of general or common law. If a statute controlled, the only matter for the decision of the court would be its construction and application, but the cases to which we shall refer the court in this brief relating to labor organizations did not involve the construction or application of a statute but only the legality of labor organizations under the common law, in the absence of a statute controlling the matter.

West Virginia by Her Own Statute Law Has Recognized The Legality of Labor Unions.

It seems to us that it does not admit of question that in this state, under its statute law, labor organizations are recognized and treated as lawful associations.

The first statute applicable here is that found in the Code of 1913 first enacted in 1890 (Acts. 1890, ch. 9 sec. 14,) Code, 1913, ch. 15H, sec. 28, serial section 87, as amended in 1907. (Acts. 1907, ch. 78, sec. 19.)

This statute, among other things, provides:

> "Nor shall any person or persons, or combination of persons, by force, threats, menaces, or intimidation of any kind, prevent or attempt to prevent from working in or about any mine, any person or persons who have the lawful right to work about the same, and who desires so to work; but this provision shall not be so construed as to prevent any two or more persons from associating together under the name of knights of labor, or any other name they may desire, for any lawful purpose, or for using moral suasion or lawful argument to induce any one not to work in or about any mine."

The section of this statute concludes with the prescribing of a penalty for its violation.

Code, W. Va. 1913 Serial Sec. 87.

As amended it went into effect May 22nd, 1907, and this suit was brought the latter part of the October following. The part of the statute above cited was in the Act of 1890, the year in which the United Mine Workers of America were organized.

The insertion in this statute of the proviso therein contained indicates that the legislature of West Virginia recognizing the existing right of working men to organize into an association or combination, did not intend to disturb or interfere with this right by the enactment of this section of the statute; or, it was designed to operate as an independent enactment. If it were designed to act as an independent enactment, and not merely as a proviso, it was simply declaratory of the common law and in aid thereof, as thereby recognized as in force in this state.

If it were designed to simply act as a proviso, it conclusively demonstrates the recognition by the legislature of the common law right of laborers to organize in this state, for all legitimate purposes of such organizations.

"A provision or exception as a general rule relates only to the paragraph or distinct portion of the enactment which immediately precedes it, and is to be confined by construction to the subject-matter of the section of which it is a part. This rule is, however, not absolute, and if the context requires, the proviso may be construed as extending to and qualifying other sections or even as being tantamount to an independent enactment."

There is also another statute recognizing working men's unions in West Virginia first enacted in 1901 appearing in the Code of 1913, as sec. 1, ch. 62E, serial sec. 3578. This section provides as follows:

> "Whenever any person, firm or corporation, or any association or union of working men, has heretofore adopted or used, or shall hereafter adopt or use any label, trademark, term, design, device or form of advertisement, for the purpose of designating, making known or distinguishing any goods, wares, merchandise or other product of labor, as having been made, manufactured, produced, prepared, packed or put on sale, by such person, firm, corporntion, or association or union of working men, or by a member or members of such association or union, and shall register the same as provided in section three of this act, it shall be unlawful to knowingly counterfeit or imitate such label, trademark, term, design, device or form of advertisement, or to knowingly use, sell, offer for sale, or in any way utter or circulate any counterfeit or imitation of any such label, trademark, term, design, device or form of advertisement."

> Another section of this statute provides a heavy penalty for counterfeiting or imitating any label, trademark, term, design, etc. adopted by any person * * * or any association or union of workingmen.

Another section of this statute provides for the registration of the label, trademark, etc.

In fact the whole statute provides for a complete protection of the label or trademark which may be adopted by any association or union of working men.

Can it be possible that a labor organization in West Virginia is regarded as unlawful, when the positive law of the state provides that it may adopt a label or trademark, and then in the same statute provides for its registration and likewise protects the use of that label or trademark under heavy penalties for counterfeiting or imitating it?

As this court knows, a trademark is one of the practical means of advertising articles of merchandise and the manufacture of such articles.

Is it not a strange inconsistency to declare that under the common law of West Virginia a labor union is unlawful, when the legislature for nearly a quarter of a century has guaranteed by its statutes the full effect and protection of all labels and trademarks adopted by any and all labor unions?

As stated by an able jurist, delivering the opinion of the Massachusetts supreme court in Tracy v. Banker, 170 Mass. 266, 39 L. R. A. 508, 509.

> "The label is part of the well known machinery of trade unions, and the use of it is found, if a finding is necessary, to be of value to the union and its members. It would not be traveling too far from the record, perhaps, if we should assume that the use of the label is in fact, as certainly it might be, of far more economic importance to the union than are many or most of the trademarks, strictly so called, which are protected by the courts. * * *
>
> "It is impossible to believe that, when the statute mentions unincorporated unions, it does not refer to trade unions It authorizes such to adopt, as well as to record, a label. Therefore it creates a right, if the court is unable to recognize one without its aid. If it applies to trade unions, it must be taken to apply to them as they ordinarily are; that is, as associations of workmen, not as manufacturers or vendors goods. It contemplates that the labels will be applied to merchandise, as of course they must be, and as these labels are." * * *
>
> "If, as we think, the statute expressly creates or recognizes the right of trade unions to be protected in the use of labels for trade union purposes, the suggestion that the association represented by the plaintiff is an unlawful association falls of itself. It is too late to make such a contention as to trade unions generally, even apart from the statute under which this suit is brought. But the general purposes of this union are similar, so far as we know to the general purposes of other unions."

The subject of union labels is thoroughly considered by Mr. Martin, the author of "The Modern Law of Labor Unions," §§356-380; and from this author we quote as follows:

> "Statutes of this character (labor union labels and trademarks) are not against public policy as unjustly discriminating in favor of the labor members of associations or unions as against that of non union workmen. * * * * A contention that the passage of acts of this character are procured for the purpose of enabling union labor organizations to boycott non-union laborers and deprive them of the legitimate fruits of their labor cannot be sustained. The court will not assume that such was the purpose and intent of the legislature, or that the labor organizations will resort to acts which are unlawful and criminal. The statutes allow the members of the union to send the product of their labors, into the markets of the country, marked in such a way as to indicate the character of their workmanship. This is a right which the law accords to every manufacturer. The court must assume therefore that the legislature, in passing statutes of this character, had in view the legitimate purpose and that it did not contemplate that the provisions thereof might be used for illegitimate purposes."

It seems to us a just conclsion from these statutes that labor unions are lawful organizations under the laws of West Virginia and that their legality is by these statutes placed beyond question—that not even a doubt can be raised as to their lawfulness.

Authorities on the General Proposition that Labor Unions are Lawful.

We have already in a former part of this brief (pp. 13-18) directed the Court's attention to many cases which hold that labor unions formed for the purposes for which this Union was organized are lawful. The general purposes of this organization are stated in this brief at page 35.

What the decisions already hold as to the purposes for which labor unions may be formed appears in this brief at page 13.

In Mogul S. S. Co. vs. McGregor, 23 Q. B. Div. 598, Id. (1892) App. Cas. 25, the facts were that the owners of certain steamships, for the purpose of securing all the freight which was shipped at certain ports, and doing a profitable business, had formed an association, and issued a circular to shippers at said ports, agreeing to allow them a certain rebate on freight bills, provided they gave their patronage exclusively to ships belonging to members of the association. The association also prohibited its soliciting agents from acting as agents for other competing lines. A suit having been brought against the members of the association, by a competing shipowner, to recover damages which had been sustained in consequence of the formation and action of the association, it was held that the acts complained of were lawful, the same having been done simply for the purpose of enabling the members of the association to hold and extend their trade; in other words, that the acts complained of amounted to no more than lawful competition in trade.

Continental Insurance Co. v. Board of Fire Underwriters, 67 Fed. 310, was a case of the same character as the last one considered, and involved an application of the same doctrine. It was held, in substance, that an association of fire underwriters which had been formed under an agreement that provided, among other things for the regulation of premium rates, the prevention of rebates, compensation of agents, and nonintercourse with companies that were not members of the association, was not an illegal conspiracy, and that the accomplishment of its purpose by lawful means would not be enjoined at the suit of a competing insurance company which was not a member of the association.

In Meier v. Speer,—Ark.—, 132 S. W. 988, the third point of the syllabus is as follows:

> "Labor unions are lawful, and laborers may organize to promote their common welfare, elevate their standard of skill, advance and maintain their wages, fix the hours of labor and rate of wages, and secure control of the work connected with > their trade, and the efforts of a labor union by any lawful means to attain these objects will not make it or their members liable in damages to those who may be directly or indirectly injured thereby."

In a recent work of high standing with the courts and members of the bar throughout the United States, the following principles are laid down, supported by a very wilderness of cases:

> "Legislatures as well as the courts now recognize the right of laboring people to organize for the purposes of promoting their common welfare, elevating their standard of skill, advancing and maintaining their wages, fixing the hours of labor and the rate of wages, obtaining employment for their members, securing control of the work connected with their trade, or favorable terms to their employers in the purchase of material, and contracts for such persons as employ members of their society. And others may combine with them for the accomplishment of these purposes."
> 24 Cyc. 819, 820, and notes.

The Supreme Court of Arkansas, in the case of Maier v. Speer, from which we have above quoted, after quoting with approval the principles laid down in 24 Cyc. 819, which are set forth above, says:

> "The efforts of labor unions by any lawful means to attain these legitimate and commendable objects will not make them or their members liable in damages to those who may be directly or indirectly injured by such efforts. For the purpose and the means used to obtain it both being lawful there could not be any conspiracy or boycott. And if any injury resulted to any one it would be merely incidental, and damnum absque injuria. The conservation of the chief asset of the laboring man, namely, his labor, through combination with his fellows and by their organized efforts, is to be commended rather than condemned. For in that way his well-being may be best promoted and the interest of society thereby advanced."

The court, after making this statement in its opinion, quotes with approval what is said by Judge Taft in Thomas v. Cincinnati, etc., Railroad Co., 62 Fed. 803, 817.

In Allis-Chalmers Co. v. Iron Molders' Union, 150 Fed. 155, 171, the court in the course of its opinion says:

> "The right of workmen to combine in trades unions, in order to secure the economic advancement of their members, is also unquestioned; and such unions are generally regarded as beneficial institutions for bettering the conditions of labor, and the relations between employer and employee"; citing Wabash Railroad Co. v. Hannahan, 121 Fed. 563.

In Wabash Railroad Co. v. Hannahan, 121 Fed. 563, in the course of the opinion the right of laborers to organize is quite fully discussed, and the court, after citing many authorities, says:

> "I might continue at length in the citation of cases stating or illustrating the foregoing propositions, but enough has been said to clearly indicate that the general rule may be briefly summarized as follows: An employee has an unquestionable right to place a price and impose conditions upon his labor at the outset of his employment, or, unless restrained by contractual obligation, upon the continuance of his labor at any time thereafter; and if the terms and conditions are not complied with by the employer, he has a clear right either not to engage, or having engaged in his service to cease from work. What one may do all may do. They may seek and obtain counsel and advice concerning their rights, duties and obligations in relation to their employer, and persons interested in their welfare may advise, aid and assist them in securing such terms and conditions of service as will best subserve their interests; and what they may lawfully do singly or together, they may organize and combine to accomplish."

In Everett Waddy Co. v. Typographical Union, 105 Va. 188, 53 S. E 275, 8 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 798, the court in the course of its opinion said:

> "It is now well settled by the decisions of the courts of the United States and of the highest courts of a majority of the states in the Union that labor may organize as capital does for its own protection and to further the interests of the laboring class. They may 'strike' and persuade and induce others to join them, but when they resort to unlawful means to cause injury to others to whom they have no relation, contractual or otherwise, the limit permitted by law is passed and they may be restrained. Gray v. Trades Council (Minn.), 97 N. W. 663, 63 L. R. A. 753, 103 Am. St. 477, and cases there cited; Murdock v. Walker, 152 Pa. 195, 25 Atl. 492, 34 Am. St. 678; Otis Steel Co. v. Local Union No 218, 110 Fed. 700; Consol S. & W. Co. v. Murray, 80 Fed. 810; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Reuff, 120 Fed. 102; Allis-Chalmers Co. v. Loge, 111 Fed. 264; Beck v. Railway Union (Mich.), 77 N. W. 13, 42. L R A. 407, 74 Am. St. 421; Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. 330; Eddy on Comb., vol. 2, §§1031, 1035; Beech on Mono. and Indus. Trusts, §§98, 100, 102; Tiedman on St. and Fed. Control of Persons and property, vol. 1, §114.

In many of the states of the Union there are statutes which provide for the incorporation of trades unions and other labor organizations, and in all of them one of the permissible objects of incorporation is declared to be the securement of better terms of employment; while at common law, as interpreted by the English decisions and a few of the earliest decisions of the courts in this country, labors combination formed for the purpose of controlling the rate of wages were regarded as a criminal conspiracy. But these early decisions of the courts of this country were soon departed from by other cases, notably in Massachusetts, New York and Pennsylvania, which placed labor combinations upon a plane of legal equality with capitalistic combinations, by holding that it was not a criminal conspiracy for workmen to combine for the purpose of enhancing the rate of wages, or for improving in any other way their relations with employers."

In the case of Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 295, the court in the course of its opinion says:

"And it is no crime for any number of persons, without an unlawful object in view, to associate themselves together and agree that they will not work for or deal with certain men or classes of men, or work under a certain price, or without certain conditions. Commonwealth v. Hunt, 4

Met. 111; Boston Glass Manufactory v. Binney, 4 Pick, 425; Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen 499.

This freedom of labor and business has not always existed. When our ancestors came here, many branches of labor and business were hampered by legal restrictions created by English statutes, and it was a long time before the community understood the importance of freedom in this respect. Some of our early legislation is of this character. One of the colonial acts, entitled 'And act against oppression,' punished by fine and imprisonment such indisposed persons as may take the liberty to oppress and wrong their neighbors by taking excessive wages for their work, or unreasonable prices for merchandise or other necessary commodity as may pass from man to man. Anc. Chart. 172. Another requires artificers, or handcraftmen to meet to labor, to work by the day for their neighbors, in mowing, reaping of corn and the inning thereof. Id. 120. Another act regulated the price of bread. Id. 752. Some of our town records show, that under the power to make by laws the towns fixed the prices of labor, provisions and several articles of merchandise, as late as the time of the revolutionary war. But experience and increasing intelligence led to the abolition of all such restrictions, and to the establishment of freedom for all branches of labor and business, and all persons who have been born and educated here, and are obliged to begin life without property, know that freedom to choose their own occupation and to make their own contracts not only elevates their condition, but secures to skill and industry and economy their appropriate advantages."

In Beck v. Railway Union, 118 Mich. 497, 74 Am. St. 421, the second point in the syllabus is as follows:

"Laborers have the right to combine and to fix a price upon their labor and refuse to work unless that price is obtained. They may use persuasion in order to induce men to join their organization, or to refuse to work except for an established wage, and they may present their cause to the public in newspapers or circulars, in a peaceable way, and with no attempt at coercion, but the law does not permit them to use force, violence, or threats thereof, or intimidation or coercion."

In Longshore Printing Co. v. Howell, 26 Ore. 527, 46 Am. St. 640, the second point of the syllabus is as follows:

> "It is no crime for any number of persons, without an unlawful object in view, to associate themselves together, and agree that they will not work for or deal with certain men or classes of men, or work under a certain price, or without certain conditions."

So in McCauley v. Tierney, 19 R. I. 255, 61 Am. St. 770, we find in the syllabus the following:

> "What a person may lawfully do, a number of persons may unite with him in doing, without rendering themselves liable to the charge of conspiracy, provided the means employed are not unlawful."

In Wilson v. Hoy, 232 Ill. 389, 85 N. E. 928, 122 Am. St. 119, point 1 of the syllabus, as appearing in the latter report, reads as follows:

> "The right of laboring people to organize for the purpose of promoting their common welfare is fully recognized. They may refuse to work for any particular employer and may obtain employment for their members by solicitation and promises of support in trade or otherwise, but in the accomplishment of this purpose they may proceed only by lawful and peaceable means, and they have no right to make war on other persons."

In Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 78, N. E. 753, 116 Am. St. 272, the first point of the syllabus, as given in 116 Am. St. 272, reads as follows:

> "Laborers have the right to organize into labor unions to promote their welfare, and a labor union has a general right to strike."

In Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuelle, 215 Mo. 421, 114 S. W. 997, 128 Am. St. 492, the first point of the syllabus reads as follows:

> "At the common law personal services could not be the subject of a monopoly. Unless there is property to be affected by a public interest, there is no basis for a charge of monopoly."

The second point of the syllabus reads as follows:

> "Individuals have a perfect legal right to form labor organizations for the protection and promotion of the interests of the laboring classes."

In the course of its opinion, in this case just cited, the court said:

> "While it might be conceded that labor organizations might be proper subjects for legislative control and regulation yet the legislature has not in its wisdom seen proper to do so; and at common law personal services—an occupation—could not be the subject of monopoly. In discussing that question, in the case of State v. Associated Press, 159 Mo. 410, 81 Am. St. 368, 60 S. W. 91, 51 L. R. A. 156, this court used this language: 'But there is nothing here on which a monopoly can attach. The business is one of mere personal service; an occupation. Unless there is "Property" to be "affected with a public interest" there is no basis laid for the fact or the charge of monopoly.'"

In Post v. Bucks Stove & R. Co., 200 Fed. 918, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) at page 502, the court in the course of its opinion says:

> "Organized labor has become an important factor in modern industrial life where its influence is widely recognized, and its rightful status under the law should not be denied because of excesses committed in its name."

In Kemp v. Division No. 241, Amal. Ass'n St. & Elec. Ry. Employes of America, 255 Ill. 213, 99 N. E. 389, 29 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 347, the second point of the syllabus is as follows:

> "Labor unions, which are associations to enable their members to negotiate matters arising between them and their employers through the intermediation of officers of the union, and to accomplish their ends through concerted action, are valid."

The subject of labor organizations is thoroughly and exhaustively considered in this case, and the authorities bearing on the matter reviewed.

In Parkinson v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581 16 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 1165, one of the points of the syllabus, as reported in 16 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas., is as follows:

> "Where individual laborers or labor organizations combine for the purpose of 'securing higher wages, shorter hours, and more favorable conditions generally than employers of labor would otherwise be willing to concede, their purpose cannot be said to be unlawful or criminal, and hence the question whether their combination constitutes a conspiracy depends upon the lawfulness of the means employed by them to effect their purpose."

The Purposes in General for Which a Labor Organization is Permissible.

We have shown by the authorities that a labor union is not unlawful, and does not of itself constitute a conspiracy. Let us now notice in general the purposes for which such a combination is permissible.

As to this, we shall content ourselves with quoting from a modern writer, who cites many authorities for the doctrine laid down in his text:

> "Broadly speaking workmen may combine to obtain any legitimate advantage. They may combine for the purpose of raising their intellectual, moral and social condition, for social enjoyment, to afford members assistance in times of poverty, sickness, and distress, for the advancement and development of the intelligence of the members, to redress grievances of members, to improve or regulate their relations with their employers to secure employment for their members, and, according to some decisions, to secure the employment of members in preference to and to the exclusion of other workmen, or to secure control of the work connected with their trade, although as will be subsequently shown, there is authority which denies the correctness of these last two propositions."
> Martin, Mod. Law. Labor Unions, §9.

The Particular Lawful Purposes for Which Labor May Organize.

We have just stated in general terms the purposes for which a labor combination is permissible. Again referring to the author just quoted from, whose examination of the subject appears to have been thorough and careful, we find that there are several specific things which labor unions may do, and that labor organizations formed for these purposes have repeatedly received the sanction of the courts, among which are the following: Maintain or advance the rate of wages; obtain reduction of hours of employment; secure careful and competent fellow-workmen; accumulate strike fund, or fund for unemployed members.

Martin, Modern Law of Labor Unions, §§ 10-13.

> "One of the foremost purposes of organization among workmen is to secure the best wages obtainable, and whatever views may have been formerly entertained on the subject, it is no longer open to question, that a combination of workmen formed for the purpose of maintaining or advancing the rate of wages, is a perfectly legitimate one."
> Idem, §10, citing a very wilderness of cases from many different states of the union, and the Federal and English courts.

The author just quoted from also lays down the doctrine, supported by the decisions, that the members of these organizations are entitled to the highest wages and the best conditions they can command; that they may fix the price of labor and refuse to work unless it is obtained, and that this right is possessed by them as individuals and in combination; that it is for the benefit of them and the public to unite in a common interest, and for lawful purposes; that if they stand together they are often able to command better prices for their labor than when dealing singly with rich employers, as the necessities of a single laborer may compel him to accept any terms offered him.

Idem.

Upon the authority of Caldwell, Judge, in Ames. v. Union Pac. R. Co., 62 Fed.," 14, the author says, that if it is lawful for the stockholders and officers of a corporation to associate together for the purpose of reducing the wages of its employes, or of advancing their means for making their investment profitable, it is equally lawful for organized labor to associate, consult and confer with a view to maintain or increase wages.

Idem.

The same author, upon the authority of many cases, states that workmen may lawfully combine to obtain a reduction of the hours of employment for the same reason that authorizes such combination to advance or maintain the rate of wages.

Idem, § 11.

Another purpose laid down by this author, well supported by authority, permissible on the part of a labor union, is the securing of careful and competent fellow servants, that the risk incident to the employment may be diminished. Of course, the reason for this is obvious. If injury results from the negligence of a fellow servant, except where a statute otherwise provides, the consequences would have to be borne by the injured servant, without compensation by the employer, and with no financial responsibility, as a general rule, on the part of those causing the injury.

Idem, § 12.

Another purpose of such an organization treated as lawful, is the accumulation of a strike fund, or a fund for unemployed members.

Idem, §13.

We have thus mentioned some of the speceific legitimate purposes for which labor unions may be organized, in order to examine into the lawfulness of the constitutions of the national and subordinate organizations of the United Mine Workers of America. And this subject we will now consider.

The Constitution and Purposes of the United Mine Workers.

Having shown the lawfulness of labor organizations, and some of the specific purposes for which they are permissible, let us now examine the constitutions of the national and subordinate organizations of the United Mine Workers of America, and the purposes of this organization, to determine whether or not this specific organization is an unlawful one, as decided and held by the District Court. This brings us to a further consideration of the fourth question arising upon the record in this case, and also to the consideration of the fifth one, which is, that if this is not a lawful organization, what part or parts of its national constitution, or district or subdistrict constitutions are contrary to the laws of West Virginia?

As we have seen, this organization is composed of three branches, the national, district and sub-district The learned District Judge declared them all illegal for the reasons set forth in his opinion at page 815 &c. To determine whether an association or combinatlon constitutes a conspiracy, it is necessary to ascertain its purposes and if these are lawful, the association itself cannot be treated as illegal if its powers are abused by those who have the management of it.

> Com V. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 38 Am. Dec 346, which is a leading and one of the early cases upon the subject of combinations of laboring men. This case is referred to and quoted from in 1 Eddy on Combinations, § 434.

As to the objects or purposes of the labor union we here quote from the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals delivered in this case.

> "In this connection it is pertinent to consider the purposes of the United Mine Workers of America, which is composed of three branches, to-wit: National, District and Sub-District, all of which were declared to be unlawful by the lower court. In the preamble of the National Constitu tion of the organization is to be found a declaration of the purposes for which it was established, which is as follows:
> 'There is no fact more generlly known, or more widely believed, than that without coal there would not have been any such grand achievements, privileges and blessings as those which characterize the twentieth century civilization, and believing as we do, that those whose lot it is to daily toil in the recesses of the earth, mining and putting out coal which makes these blessings possible, are entitled to a fair and equitable share of the same; therefore we have formed "The United Mine Workers of America," for the purpose of the more readily securing the object sought by educating all mine workers in America to realize the necessity of union of action and purpose, in demanding and securing by lawful means the just fruits of our toil. And we hereby declare to the world that our objects are:

'First—To secure an earning fully compatible with the dangers of our calling and the labor performed.

'Second. To establish as speedily as possible, and forever, our right to receive pay, for labor performed, in lawful money, and to rid ourselves of the iniquitous system of spending our money wherever our employers see fit to designate.

'Third. To secure the introduction of any and all well defined and established appliances for the preservation of life, health and limbs of all mine employes.

'Fourth. To reduce to the lowest possible minimum the awful catastrophes which have been sweeping our fellow-craftsmen to untimely graves by the thousands; by securing legislation looking to the most perfect system of ventilation, drainage, etc.

'Fifth. To enforce existing laws; and where none exist, enact and enforce them; calling for a plentiful supply of suitable timber for supporting the roofs, pillars, etc., and to have all working places rendered as free from water and impure air and poisonous gases as possible.

'Sixth. To uncompromisingly demand that eight hours shall constitute a day's work, and not more than eight hours shall be worked in any one day by any mine worker. The very nature of our employment, shut out from the sunlight and impure air, working by the aid of artificial light (in no instance to exceed one candle power), would in itself, strongly indicate that, of all men, a coal miner has the most righteous claim to an eight-hour day.

'Seventh. To provide for the education of our children by laws prohibiting their employment until they have attained a reasonably satisfactory education, and in every case until they have attained fourteen years of age.

'Eighth. To abrogate all laws which enable coal operators to cheat the miners, and to substitute laws which will enable the miner, under the protection and majesty of the State, to have his coal properly weighed or measured, as the case may be.

'Ninth. To secure by legislation, weekly payments in lawful money.

'Tenth. To render it impossible, by legislative enactment in every State, for coal operators or corporations to employ Pinkerton detectives or guards, or other forces (except the ordinary forces of the State) to take armed possession of the mines in case of strikes or lockouts.

'Eleventh. To use all honorable means to maintain peace between ourselves and employers: adjusting all differences, so far as possible by arbitration and conciliation, that strikes may become unnecessary.'

"The constitution of District 6 contains the same declaration of purposes, with the following added:

"Twelfth. And to use all honorable means to elect members of our organization to legislate and enforce laws in State and National legislative assemblies that will bear equally upon all citizens of the United States, its territories and other dominions.

'And we further declare it to be the purpose of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, to give moral and material aid to all its members in good standing and to those who may be dependent upon them, and to render such assistance as may be possible to all our members socially and financiily, and to create a relief fund for members in distress, subject to the discretion of the officers and Executive Board of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, as hereinafter provided.' "

(Record pp. 727, 728; 214 Fed. at pp 699, 700.)

The constitution of Sub-District 5 of District 6, contains the same declaration of purposes as that appearing in the constitution of the international organization.

An examination of these purposes, as disclosed in each of these constitutions, shows nothing unlawful, but on the contrary, every purpose expressed therein is commendable. Take, for illustration, the first purpose, designed to secure wages compatible with the dangers incident to mining.

An examination of the statistics as to the casualties and fatalities attendant upon the business of mining coal, discloses that it is one of the most dangerous occupations in which any one may be engaged. In West Virginia alone, during the first eleven months of the year 1913, over three hundred were killed in the mines, and it is matter of comment over the state that this shows a decrease in the fatalties as compared with former years; while a very large number were seriously injured, many times more than the number killed, some of these injuries being permanent, and disabling the parties from pursuing their vocation of mining; and others disabled to a less extent, lessening their capacity for earning a livelihood. The uncontradicted evidence of the witness, T. L. Lewis, (record pp. 507, 506) shows that from evidence produced from time to time, mining is known to be the most dangerous occupation in this country outside of that of the powder mills; and the witness further states that to secure an earning fully commensurate with the dangers of this occupation, the miner should receive for his labor the highest standard of wages; but until the union was organized the men only got the standard of wages paid to ordinary, common every-day labor that required no skill.

Can it be possible that there is anything at all unlawful in reference to this object? It seems clear to us that this is a laudable purpose, and one in which the State itself is deeply interested.

As to the second clause in the preamble, the witness Lewis, then President of the national organization, shows the wisdom and policy thereof. If this object be accomplished it would greatly redound to the benefit of the miners as well as the State. (Record pp. 508, 509.)

As to the third clause, relating to the introduction of any and all well-defined and established appliances for the preservation of life, health and limb of all mine employes, the State itself has been stimulated as a result of this organization, in putting into effect better legislation designed to accomplish these purposes. A full explanation of the reason for this clause is show by the testimony of the same witness, which is uncontradicted, at pages 509, 510, of the record.

As to clause fourth, designed to reduce to the lowest possible minimum the catastrophes incident to mining, the same witness at page 601 shows the necessity for action of this sort, and completely justifies it, if any defense were needed other than the reading of the clause itself. (Record p. 510.)

The fifth clause is also self-explanatory, wherein one of the objects of this organization is declared to be the enforcement of laws, and where none exist, their enactment and enforcement calling for a plentiful supply of suitable timber for supporting the roof, chambers, etc., and to have all working places rendered as free from water, and impure air and poisonous gases as possible. This clause must be read in connection with the former clause, having for its purpose, as already stated, the reduction to the lowest possible minimum of the awful catastrophes incident to mining.

The sixth clause of this preamble is also explained by the witness Lewis in his evidence at pages 510 and 511. The purpose of this clause is to secure eight hours as a day's work, the reason for which is set forth in the clause itself. It is not unlawful on the part of an organization whose members are engaged in underground mining, to insist that eight hours is long enough for a day's work in such an occupation.

The Supreme Court of the United States, upholding a statute of Utah making eight hours a day's work for workmen in all underground mines, except in cases of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger, in the course of its opinion, says:

> "This right of contract, however, is itself subject to certain limitations which the state may lawfully impose in the exercise of its police powers. While this power is inherent in all governments, it has doubtless been greatly expanded in its application during the past century, owing to an enormous increase in the number of occupations which are dangerous, or so far detrimental to the health of employees as to demand special precaution for their well being and protection, or the safety of adjacent property.

* * * * *

While the business of mining coal and manufacturing iron began in Pennsylvania as early as 1716, and in Virginia, North Carolina and Massachusetts even earlier than this, both mining and manufacturing were carried on in such a limited way and by such primitive methods that no special laws were considered necessary, prior to the adoption of the Constitution, for the protection of the operative, but, in the vast proportions which these industries have since assumed, it has been found that they can no longer be carried on with due regard to the safety and health of those engaged in them, without special protection against the dangers necessarily incident to these employments. In consequence of this, laws have been enacted in most of the States designed to meet these exigencies and to secure the safety of persons peculiarly exposed to these dangers."

Holden v. Hardy, 169 U S. 391, 42 L. ed. at bot. p. 791.

And in the course of this opinion, the court further says:

"Upon the principles above stated, we think the act in question may be sustained as a valid exercise of the police power of the state. The enactment does not profess to limit the hours of all workmen, but merely those who are employed in the underground mines, or in the smelting, reduction, or refining of ores or metals These employments when too long pursued the legislature has judged to be detrimental to the health of the employees, and, so long as there are reasonable grounds for believing that this is so, its decision upon this subject cannot be reviewed by the Federal courts.

While the general experience of mankind may justify us in believing that men may be engaged in ordinary employments more than eight hours per day without injury to their health, it does not follow that labor for the same length of time is innocuous when carried on beneath the surface of > the earth, when the operative is deprived of fresh air and sunlight, and is frequently subjected to foul atmosphere and a very high temperature, or to the influence of noxious gases, generated by the processes of refining or smelting."

From this decision it is quite apparent that the laborer who is engaged in mining coal beneath the surface of the earth, ought not to be required to labor in such a place longer than eight hours a day, and it cannot certainly be unlawful to be inserted as one of the purposes of the organization to secure this limit of hours. But, as we have already seen in this brief from the authorities, an association may lawfully have for one of its purposes the securing of eight hours as a day's work.

The seventh clause of this preamble was also explained by the witness Lewis, and his evidence is uncontradicted, and it cannot be contradicted, and appears in the record at pages 511, 512.

The eighth clause is designed to secure legislation to prevent wrong being perpetrated against the miner in the measurement of his coal. It is simply a demand that he be justly compensated for the dangerous and arduous work of mining coal This is also explained by the testimony of the witness Lewis, appearing in the record at pages 512 and 513, and shows that when a mine is operated under contract between the operator and the United Mine Workers, that a check weighman is provided by the miners themselves, and that to this there is no objection, because it appears in the record that the check weighman is paid by the miners and not by the operator.

The ninth clause of the preamble is designed to secure weekly payments in lawful money. The purpose of this is explained by the witness Lewis, and clearly establishes the good sense and fairness of such purpose; although the witness shows that the semi-monthly pay is satisfactory, as a general rule, and it does not seem that any effort is being made now to carry out the purpose of a weekly payment, since the semi-monthly payment has been obtained. The evidence of the witness as to this clause appears in the record at pages 512 514.

The tenth clause has for its object legislation to prevent the importation of mine guards belonging to detective agencies, and who have done so much to create disturbances, strife and bloodshed in the communities into which they have gone.

The reason for inserting this clause in the preamble as one of the objects of the association, is given by Lewis, then the president of the association, in his testimony appearing at pages 514, 515.

The evidence here shows that such conditions prevailed in the state of Ohio before this organization was created, largely produced by the presence of armed guards belonging to what is called Pinkerton's detectives, as to make it a matter of grave concern to the mine workers as to what they could do to prevent it. The results of this organization along this line are stated in the testimony of the witness, whose evidence has just been referred to.

The soundness and legality, as well as the good sense and fairness of the eleventh clause of the purposes of the organization, are self evident. The purpose is to avoid strikes by means of arbitration and conciliation. The purpose of this clause is set out in the testimony of Lewis, and appears therein at pages 515 and 516. In speaking of this clause, the witness says:

> "In negotiating with a mine owner to employ union labor, 'the policy of the organization has always been to get the consent of the mine owner rather than to coerce him, and I might add to that, that coercion may be susceptible of many constructions. For instance, we have had cases where a number of men that were organized at a mine have said to the employer, 'You can employ whoever you see fit, union or non union, but if you want our services we reserve the right to say whether or not we will work there while that man is working there.' Some people say that is coercion. If it is, everything in life is coercion."

It will be observed that the witness here in speaking of coercion, says that it may be susceptible of many constructions. Giving an illustration, he speaks of members of the organization reserving the right to quit the services of an employer if he engages non-union labor. This is a right which not only one employe would have as a member of the union, to quit at his option for any cause seeming to him sufficient, but any number of persons members of an organization would have the same right.

Kemp v. Division No. 241, 255, Ill, 213, 99 N. E. 389, 29 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cases 347.

In the course of the opinion in this case the court says:

> "If the members of the union honestly believed that it was to their best interests to be engaged in the same employment with union men only, and that it was a detriment to their organization to associate in the same employment with non-members, it was their right to inform the common employer that they would withdraw from his service and strike, unless members of the organization only were employed, even though an acquiescence in their demands would incidentally result in the loss of employment on the part of the non-union men. It was only incumbent upon them to act in a peaceful and lawful manner in carrying out their plans."

In the preamble to the constitution of District 6, of which Sub-District 5 is a part, there are two other purposes set forth, one numbered as the twelfth and the other not numbered.

As to the twelfth, the object expressed is the use of honorable means to secure legislation that will bear equally upon all citizens of the United States and its territories. This purpose seems wholly unnecessary, as each member of the union would have the right to vote for whom he pleases as a representative in any legislative body where the right to vote exists, and that too without any reference to his membership in the union. While this purpose seems to be superfluous, yet it shows the spirit with which this organization is animatad. Evidently it is an effort on their part to secure legislation which will make tion. This method is only used when conciliation has not been effectual in the particular instances in which its aid has been invoked. It is scarcely necessary to discuss this agency of settling disputes, and we content ourselves by referring to the writings of eminent political economists.

Perhaps the most important and spectacular example of arbitration in the case of a labor dispute in this country was the settlement of the anthracite coal strike in 1902.

The mine operators and the miners agreed in advance to abide by the decision of the Commission. The miners went back to work and the Commission made a very careful study of the labor situation in the anthracite region.

The miners were granted an increase in wages of 10 per cent above the rate previously paid. Various controverted matters, such as the employment of check weighmen and the distribution of mine cars were considered in the award of the Commission.

A method of conciliation was provided in order to settle questions of interpretation of the terms of the award.

Strikes.

Another and last method of promoting the purpose of the organization is by means of a strike. It is well settled by judicial decisions that a strike is lawful. It only becomes unlawful when the means employed to carry it out are unlawful, or when it is maliciously originated to attain an unlawful end.

In support of this statement of the law the court is referred to the following authorities:

ers' Union, 165 Ind. 421, 75 N. E. 877, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 788, 789.

Goldfield Cons. Mines Co. v. Goldfield Miners Union, 159 Fed. 300.

We lay down the abstract doctrine here that a strike is lawful under the state and federal decisions; but in order to understand just what a strike is, let us ascertain how the courts define it. On this subject we refer the court to a recent treatise (1910) by Mr. W. A. Martin, reviewing editor of Cyc., in a work entitled, "The Modern Law of Labor Unions," in which the subject of strikes is exhaustively considered: In section 25 he gives various definitions, citing several authorities in support thereof, and from this section we here copy the following;

"Strikes have been variously defined as follows:

'A combination among laborers, or those employed by others, to compel an increase of wages, change in hours of labor, a change in manner of conducting the business of the principal, or to enforce some particular policy in the character or the number of men employed, or the like."

'The act of a party of workmen employed by the same master, in stopping work all together at a preconcerted time, and refusing to continue until higher wages or shorter time, or some other concession is granted to them by the employer."

'A combined effort of workmen to obtain higher wages, or other concessions from their employers by stopping work at a preconcerted time.'

'To press a claim or demand by coercive or threatening action of some kind; in common usage to quit work along with others, in order to compel an employer to accede to some demand, as for increase of pay, or to protest against something as a reduction of wages; as to strike for higher pay, or shorter hours of work."

'To quit work in order to compel an increase or prevent a reduction of wages.'

'To quit work in a body or by combination, in order to compel their employer to raise their wages.

"The act of workmen in any trade or branch of industry when they leave their work with the object of compelling the master to concede certain demands made by them—as an advance of wages, a shortening of hours of work, the withdrawal of any obnoxious rule or regulation, or the like."

'A combined effort among workmen to compel the master to the concession of a certain demand, by preventing the conduct of his business until compliance with the demand. The concerted cessation of work is but one of, and the least effective of, the means to the end; the intimidation of others from engaging in the service, the interference with, and the disabling and destruction of property, and resort to actual force and violence, when requisite to the accomplishment of the end, being the other and more effective means employed.'

"To cease from work in order to extort higher wages as workmen.'

'A simultaneous cessation of work on the part of the workmen.'

'To cease working in a body and by prearrangement until a grievance is redressed.'

'A cessation of work by employes in an effort to get better terms of employment.'

It will be observed that one of these definitions makes strikes unlawful. The error in this defination consists in including the means to be used in rendering the strike effective and in enumerating only those means which are unlawful. Some of the other definations herein set out are defective and misleading in that they attempt to enumerate the specific objects which the combination is designed to effect instead of being confined to a statement of the general object, — i. e., the enforcement of compliance by the employer with a demand of the combination. A careful study of labor disputes will show that these objects are so varied and numerous that any attempt to enumerate them within the narrow compass of a definition is an impossibility and can only result in confusion and error. The better way to define a strike is to exclude from consideration the specific objects which it is designed to effect, and the means to render it effective, which taken singly or in conjunction determine the legality or illegality of the strike. In accordance with this view, a strike may be defined as a simultaneous cessation of work, by workmen acting in combination to compel their common employer to accede to demands made on him by such combination."

The authority cited in support of the above definitions which holds all strikes unlawful is Farmers Loan & Trust Co. v. Pacific Railway Co., 60 Fed. 803, 821. This decision is against all the authorities, so far as we have been able to examine them, except possibly another case inconsiderately and inadvertently decided in the state court of Nebraska, which we have seen, but are unable at this time to refer the court to it.

This same author, in discussing the general right of workmen to strike in section 30 of the treatise just quoted from, says:

> "While, as will be subsequently shown, it is by no means true that all strikes are lawful, there is no question as to the general right of workmen to strike. Their right to organize and to utilize their organization by instituting a strike is an exercise of the common law right of every man to pursue his calling, whether of labor or business, as he in his judgment sees fit. And while they are under no obligation to do so, they may if so inclined state their reasons for striking, and notice thereof may be given by the strikers themselves, or through the agency of the organization to which they belong. Expressions are sometimes found in opinions, not necessary to a decision of the case, to the effect that workmen not under contract for a definite time, acting in concert, have an absolute right to quit work. But this proposition tested by the rules relating to torts and conspiracies stated in a preceding section is clearly incorrect. The lawfulness of a strike depends not only on the means to render it effective, but also upon its object. A combination to quit work is lawful only where its purpose is to obtain a benefit for the parties which they can legally claim. If the primary object is to injure others in their business or calling, or to compel them to do some criminal or unlawful injury to others, or to deprive them of their liberty of action without just > cause, and not to advance the interests of the union, except perhaps in some remote or indirect way, the combination is unlawful. The law which allows a combination for the purpose of obtaining a lawful benefit gives no sanction to combinations which have for their immediate purpose the injury or hurt of another. While members of a union may, in their efforts to improve their condition inflict more or less damage or injury on others, these results shall be incidental damage and inconvenience consequent on the operation of general rules lawful in themselves, rather than those which follow a specific intent and immediate purpose of injury to others in order that good may come to themselves."

In support of the principles announced in this section the author cites a very large number of cases from many states in the Union, as well as a like number from the federal courts.

In section 31 of this work the author states, citing both state and federal courts in support of the proposition, that unless restrained by contractual relations, workmen may, in order to maintain or advance the wages or procure shorter hours of employment, or to obtain any other legitimate object, agree to and quit in a body provided it is done in a peaceable and quiet manner and without violence or destruction of property. A strike for the purpose mentioned is just and praiseworthy, and is not a combination for the purpose of doing harm malevelently for the sake of the harm as an end in itself and not merely as a means to some further end legitimately desired. So long as the strike is for a legitimate purpose, the fact that injury results to the employer does not alter the character of the act and render it unlawful. If ruin to the employer results from the peaceable assertion by workmen of their rights, it is a damage without a remedy. Indeed, it is readily seen that if the quitting of the employment resulted in no injury to the employer the object of the combination would necessarily fail. The right to strike for the purpose mentioned is so far absolute that the courts have as yet discovered no right to which it must yield.

In section 33 of this work, citing an abundance of authority in support of the proposition, we find the following doctrine announced:

> "So it has been declared by no less an authority than the Supreme Court of the United States that the right is not affected by the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, although the exercise of the right would enhance the cost of transporting interstate freight and by the lower federal courts that a strike for the purposes under consideration is not in violation of the Interstate Commerce Act, though it may incidentally result in interference with the interchange of traffic with connecting lines, not in violation of section 3995 of the Revised Statutes of the United States making it an offense to retard the mails, even though the strike may incidentally retard the mails."

In section 34 of this treatise, citing the authorities to uphold the doctrine, we find it laid down that strikes are lawful, instituted to redress the grievances of individual members. This section reads as follows:

> "There is nothing unlawful in a strike to redress grievances of individual members. Thus it would seem that members of a union may lawfully strike to secure the re-employment of a member they regard as having been improperly discharged. 'The very object of labor organizations,' it has been said, 'is to impart to every laborer the strength of all.' A great nation will go to war to maintain the rights of its humblest citizens. * * * The cause of one laborer is the cause of all laborers. * * * It was also said in another decision that 'it is right that all members of a union should unite for the protection of the interests of every individual member. If the feeblest of its members has a just grievance as an employee against their common employer, it is proper that the whole combination should act together to obtain redress of the wrong. The most effective way of enforcing the right of every member to just treatment from his employer, in reference to wages, hours of labor and other things affecting his interests, is by withholding the labor of the union until justice shall be done."

Upon a review of all the authorities bearing on the subject, in section 35 of this same work, we find the following doctrine announced:

> "According to the great weight of authority, so long as they act from a proper motive,—i. e., where the immediate purpose is not to injure others, but to advance their own legitimate interests, and improve their own condition, members of a union, who are not bound by a service contract for a definite time, may without rendering themselves liable either civilly or criminally refuse to work in company with men who do not belong to their union, and may strike or threaten to strike to procure their discharge from employment, or to prevent their being employed in shops where members of the union are at work, and notification of the intention to strike may be given by the members themselves or through the agency of their organization."

In section 36 the author discusses strikes where the purpose is to secure the employment of efficient and careful fellow workmen, and the following doctrine, abundantly supported by reason and authority, is announced:

> "In a number of cases it has been held that the refusal of members of a union to work with those who do not belong to their union and strikes or threats of strikes to procure their discharge is lawful, when the motive of their acts is to secure careful and skilled fellow workmen, and imposes no liability on those joining in such acts either to a civil action for damages or to an injunction or to a criminal prosecution. And when it can be seen from the facts found by the trial court that such motive or other motives of advantage to themselves may have prompted the action of the organization and its members, a reviewing court, which can review only upon the law, will not presume that another and an unlawful motive, and one not stated in the finding of fact, prompted their action. That the rule announced in these cases, is correct, is too plain for argument. Acts of the character under consideration find ample justification in the facts that the fellow-servant doctrine except where changed by statute exempts the master from liability for injuries to a servant caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant, and that the only recourse of the injured servant is an action to recover his damages from the servant whose negligence caused the injury and who is usually 'law proof'. As was said by Chief Justice Parker of the New York Court of Appeals; "So long as the law compels the employee to bear the burden of the injury in such cases, it cannot be open to question but that a legitimate and necessary object of labor unions would be to assure the lives and limbs of their members against the negligent acts of a reckless co-employee; it is well known that some men, even in the presence of danger, are perfectly reckless of themselves and careless of the rights of others, with the result that accidents are occurring almost constantly which snuff out the lives of workmen as if they were candles or leave them to struggle through life maimed and helpless. These careless, reckless men are known to their associates, who not only have the right to protect themselves from such men, but, in the present state of the law, it is their duty, through their organization, to attempt to do it, as to the trades affording special opportunities for mischief arising from recklessness. Hence it is clearly within the right of an organization to provide such method of examination and such tests as will secure a careful and competent membership, and to insist that protection of life and limb requires that they shall not be compelled to work with men whom they have not seen fit to admit into their organization.' Every workman assumes many risks arising from the incompetency or negligence of his fellow workman. It would be an anamalous doctrine to hold that after his fellows have concluded that he was not a safe or desirable companion, they must continue to work with him under the penalty of paying damages if by their refusal to do so, the works are for a time stopped and he thrown out of employment."

So, in section 37, where the object of the strike is to secure the employment of fellow workmen of good character and conduct, the author says:

"Expressions are found in some opinions which amont to an extension of the rule laid down in the preceding section. Thus it was said by Chief Justice Cockburn in an English decision that if several persons in the employment of a master > considered others in that employment obnoxious, either personally or on account of their character or conduct, they have a perfect right to put to their employer the alternative whether he will discharge the obnoxious person or persons and retain their services, or lose them and retain the obnoxious persons; and in a Massachusetts case, where the gravamen of the action was the execution of a conspiracy by a combination of union men to procure the discharge of a fellow-servant for refusing to join the union, it was said: 'If the plaintiff's habits, or conduct or character had been such as to render him an unfit associate in the shop for ordinary workmen of good character, that would have been a sufficient reason for interference in behalf of his shopmates. * * * But the evidence tended to show that the only reason for procuring his discharge was his refusal to join the union.'"

So, where the purpose of the strike is to secure the employment of members of the union in preference to non-union men or members of another union, the same author in section 38, supporting his statements of the law with a long citation of the authorities, says:

> "The refusal of members of a union to work with men who do not belong to their union, and strikes or threats of strikes to cause their discharge, or to prevent their obtaining employment, is perfectly lawful where the motive for so doing is to secure employment of members of the union in preference to those who do not belong to it, whether non-union men or members of another union. Neither the employes whose discharge has been caused nor the employer coerced into discharging his employees have any ground of complaint, and such acts will not be enjoined at the suit of the workmen, injured thereby. So such acts not being unlawful would not furnish any foundation for an action for damages or a criminal prosectuon for conspiracyy. This doctrine has been applied both in cases where the acts complained of, though restricting the opportunities of workmen not belonging to the union for finding employment at their trade, did not al together deprive them thereof, and in cases where the effect of such acts was to deprive them absolutely of any chance to work at their trade, and render it necessary for them to seek employment of a different character. It has been said—and no valid reason can be given for limiting or denying the statement— 'that competition in labor is in all essentials analogous to competition in trade and the same principles apply to each.' The decisions on the question under consideration proceed upon the theory that such acts are justifiable as legitimate competition; that free competition is worth more than it costs, and that on this ground the infliction of damage is privileged. Within all the authorities upholding the principles of competition, if the motive be to destroy another person's business, in order to secure business for one's self, the motive is good and the resulting damage, damnum absque injuria. Competition, whether between individuals, or between combinations of men, carried on for the purpose of gain, even to the extent of intending to and actually accomplishing the result of driving out of business one of the individuals or combinations, is not actionable unless there was malice. Such action on both sides is the exercise by competing persons of equal conflicting rights, and when equal rights clash the law can not interfere. There is a manifest discrimination, well-recognized, between a combination of workmen, to secure the exclusive employment of its members, and a combination whose primary object is to procure the discharge of an outsider and his deprivation of employment. In the first case the action of the combination is primarily for the betterment of its fellow members. In the second case, such action is primarily to impoverish and crush another by making it immpossible for him to work there, or so far as possible anywhere."

We have not quoted all of section 38, as it is largely devoted to a consideration of the distinction stated in the section quoted, and therefore is not of interest to us here, and is foreign to our purpose; that is, the consideration of the lawfulness of the purpose of a strike.

The author, in discussing the question whether a strike to compel workmen outside of the union to join the union is lawful in section 39 of his work, says:

"The decisions are not in accord as to whether strikes or threats of strikes by members of a union to compel the discharge from employment of other workmen unless they join the union are lawful. In some decisions, it is distinctly held that such acts are lawful and that the discharge of such workmen in consequence thereof furnishes no ground for an action for damages, a suit for injunction, or a criminal prosecution. This right, it is believed, is also sustained by an early Massachusetts case in which Chief Justice Shaw wrote the opinion of the court. In this case he said that the indictment alleged in substance 'that the defendant and others formed themselves into a society and agreed not to work for any person who should employ any journeyman or other person not a member of such society, after notice given him to discharge such workman.' 'The manifest intent of the association is to induce all those engaged in the same occupation to become members of it. Such a purpose is not unlawful. It would give them a power which might be exerted for useful and honorable purposes or for dangerous and pernicious ones. * * * Nor can we perceive that the objects of this association, whatever they may have been, were to be obtained by criminal means. The means which they proposed to employ * * * were that they would not work for a person who, after due notice, should employ a journeyman not a member of their society. * * * As the object would be lawful and the means not unlawful, such an agree could not be pronounced a criminal conspiracy.' The exact language of the opinion is set out here to enable the investigator to form his own opinion as to what was actually held in that case, in as much as a recent Massachusetts case, in which this case is cited, and which is considered in the following section, denies the right under discussion."

In section 40 the author takes up the contrary view as given by different courts, and makes a statement of the rule and of the reasons on which it is based.

It is well settled that members of a union will not be enjoined from striking; and in considering this subject Mr. Martin, section 52 of the treatise already quoted, says:

"It is a rule of long settled standing that courts of equity will not by injunction prevent one individual from quitting the personal service of another. No matter how inadequate the remedy at law, the arm of a court of equity can not be extended by mandatory injunction to compel the enforcement of personal service as against either the employer or his employee. It would be impracticable to enforce the relation of master and servant against the will of either, and an invasion of one's natural liberty to compel him to work for or to remain in the personal service of another. With the exception of one decision which was subsequently modified on appeal, and which provoked a great deal of adverse criticism both in this country and England, it has been uniformly held in accordance with the elementary doctrine enunciated that courts have no power to enjoin workmen from withdrawing from the service of their employer in a body, and it is immaterial that such withdrawal involves a breach of contract to work for a definite period of time rendering those withdrawing liable in damages to the party injured, or to a criminal prosecution. Nor is a departure from the rule justified by the fact that the employees sought to be enjoined are in the service of a receiver of a quasi public corporation, or that they may quit under circumstances that would show bad faith upon their part or a reckless disregard of their contract or of the convenience and interests of both employer and the public. In the celebrated case of Arthur v. Oakes, which arose in the great railroad strike of 1894, it was contended that the doctrine was inapplicable, or should not be applied, in the case of employees of a railroad company, which under legislative sanction constructs and maintains a public highway primarily for the convenience of the people, and in the regular operation of which the public are vitally interested Justice Harlan disposed of this contention as follows: 'Undoubtedly, the simultaneous cessation of work by any considerable number of the employes of a railroad corporation without previous notice will have an injurious effect and for a time inconvenience the public. But these evils, great as they are, and although arising in many cases from the inconsiderate conduct of employees and employers, both equally indifferent to the general welfare, are to be met and remedied by legislation restraining alike employees and employers, so far as necessary adequately to guard the rights of the public as involved in the existence, maintenance and safe management of public highways. In the absence of legislation to the contrary, the right of one in the service of a quasi-public corporation to withdraw therefrom at such time as he sees fit, and the right of the managers of such corporation to discharge an employee from service whenever they see fit, must be deemed so far absolute that no court of equity will compel him, against his will, to remain in such service or actully to perform the personal acts required in such employments or compel such managers against their will to keep a particular employee in their service.'"

The author also, in section 54, considers the principles as announced by the various courts forbidding injunctions to restrain officers of unions from inducing or consenting to strikes, and says:

"While it is well settled that courts of equity are without power to enjoin workmen individually or collectively from stopping work, the question frequently arises whether the courts have power to grant an injunction restraining officers of a union from calling or consenting to strikes, and if so under what circumstances such injunctions will issue. Now it may be stated at the outset that according to well settled principles, members of a union have the right to appoint officers who shall advise them as to the course to be taken by them in regard to their relations with their employers. This right of choosing leaders is no greater pretention than that which is recognized in every other department of industry, and the officers so appointed may if such authority has been vested in them, order the members to strike because the terms of the employment are unsatisfactory. The rule deducible from all the authorities—and no other is possible from any point of view—is that courts have no power to enjoin officers vested with the requisite authority and acting in good faith from calling a lawful strike by the members of the union which they represent, that is to say, a strike the object of which the law regards as lawful, and which involves no breach of contract on the part of those called out. This rule is in no way restricted or limited by the fact that the strike might incidentally interrupt the passage of the mails, or the transportation of inter-state commerce, or by the fact that the employer is a receiver managing property under the direction of the court. And according to the weight of authority and reason also, the rule applies with full force and effect, though such coercion and compulsion as is incidental to the imposition of or threats, express, or implied, to impose penalties is made use of for the purpose of compelling recalcitrant members to join the strike. Especially should the rule not be denied or restricted where it is shown that the members have voted to strike and that under the constitution and by-laws of the union no strike can be declared without the sanction of the officers. To enjoin them from ordering or otherwise causing a strike these circumstances would be, in substance and effect, an injunction against resort to a atrike by employees who are members of the order for the redress of asserted grievances, and this under the well settled rules of law cannot be done. In applying these principles, it has been held that if no breach of contract on the part of the members of the union is involved by a strike, its officers will not be enjoined from ordering them to strike where the object is to restore to its original status a scale of wages which has been reduced, or to secure an increase of wages and change in the rules of work, or to secure terms of employment the maintenance of which has become the established policy of the union, or to secure the discharge from employment of persons not members and to secure the places so vacated for members of the union, or to secure the employment of efficient and careful fellow workmen."

In support of the principle announced here as laid down in section 54 of this work, the author cites a long list of cases, both state and federal.

If the object of the strike be to better the condition of those belonging to the union, and the purpose of it be not unlawful, nor the method of its pursuit illegal, there can be no question about the right of the members of a labor organization to institute a strike, nor the authority of its officers to direct or call a strike. If, however, on the other hand, the object and methods of conducting it be not lawful, or its purpose be to injure others without any benefit to the organization, then the right to strike does not exist.

The law will not presume that the members will institute or conduct an unlawful strike; but the presumption is that every man will conduct himself in a law abiding manner; and hence, the settlement of disputes and the furtherance of the object of the organization by means of strikes is not unlawful.

The Learned District Court Held the Organization Unlawful.

The court below, after setting out in its opinion the obligation of the members of this labor organization, and certain parts of the international, district and sub-district constitutions. (record pp. 807-815) then states at pages 815 and 816 of the record—

> "It is not to be assumed that because I have not discussed other of the rules and purposes of this organization that I have ignored their meritorious and beneficient character; nor that I have not considered the very natural and human instinct inspiring the officers and members of this union, resident in other states and laboring under physical disadvantage in mining conditions, to regard their personal interests as paramount. Most of its officers have testified in open court before me and have fully convinced me that they are men sincere in the conviction of the integrity of their action, perfectly frank and truthful in their testimony, self educated and who have by their own effort rightly acquired the leadership in their life work. So far as I am concerned, the law requires me to consider these rules of the organization and ascertain whether any of them are unlawful in character. If so, whether the unlawful ones dominate the actions and purposes of the organization, or whether the purposes contemplated by the unlawful ones are so intermingled with those designed by the lawful ones as to render separation impracticable."

Evidently those parts of these constitutions set forth in the opinion of the learned district judge (record 808-815) together with the obligation, are the ones treated by him as unlawful, and because of the interdependence of these with the other parts of the constitutions, the instruments are unlawful as a whole.

This conclusion is based on the English cases of Chamberlain's Wharf, Limited, v. Smith, (1900) 2 Ch. 605 (record p. 773); Cullen v. Edwin, (1903) 88 L. T. 686, (record pp. 774, 775); Gosney v. Bristol, etc., Trade and Provident Society, (1909 1 K. B. 901 (record p. 775); Russell v. Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, (1910) 1 K. B. 501; and 81 L. J. K. B. 619 (record p. 776); Mudd v. General Union of Operative Carpenters and Joiners, (1910) 103 L. J. 45; Thomas v. Portsmouth (A) Branch of the Ship Constructive, etc., Society, reported in the Times Law Reports May 3, 1912.

An examination of these English cases discloses that they were predicated upon English statutes, and upon the courts' conception also of the rights of labor unions at common law in England.

In these cases it clearly appeared that the purposes of the organizations were not within the purview of the English statutes authorizing their existence and operation. That being the case, the question arises as to whether or not they could be sustained at common law, and the courts held, of course, that they could not be, because that was against the conceptions of the English courts as to the rights of labor organizations at common law.

It will be observed with reference to the first case, Chamberlain's Wharf, Limited, v. Smith, (record p. 773,) that a contest between the members of the association was involved. The court held that the association was a trade union within the meaning of section 16 of the Trade Union Act, Amendment Act, 1876; that its objects were illegal independently of the Trade Union Act, 1871, and that s. 4 of that Act prevented the court from directly enforcing the agreement between the members. How can this decision be applicable to this case?

In the case of Cullen v. Edwin, (record p. 774) the court was dealing with the subject of labor organizations and the Trade Union Acts, and of course, it could not exist at common law, because it was treated as in restraint o trade according to the views of the English courts. Hov could that case apply to the case at bar? The same re marks apply to all the other cases relied upon by th learned District Judge to overthrow the legality of th association of the mine workers.

This court will examine these cases, and will necessaril conclude that the premises of the District Court upo which he bases his conclusion, founded as they are upo these English decisions, can find no place in our courts because the principles underlying the conclusions reache by the English court were controlled by the consideratio of the rights of labor organizations at common law an the Acts of Parliament. At common law they could no exist at all, according to the English courts, and if the existed under Act of Parliament, it was necessary for th organizations to bring themselves clearly within the pu view of these acts.

But, as we have seen, our courts refuse to declare tha at common law these labor organizations were illega
And they further hold that if this was the doctrine of th common law of England, that that part of it is not adapte to our conditions here and not in harmony with the geniu of our institutions.

The court clearly bases his conclusions stated at pag 687 of the record upon the obligation (record p. 68 which the member takes upon joining the organizatio and those parts of the constitution set out in the opinio and already referred to. There are six different reason appearing in the courts opinion for holding this labo union unlawful, and these we shall consider in their orde

The Rules Undertake to Require Members of the Organization t Surrender Their Individual Freedom.

This is assumed because of the provision found in th obligation that the member promises to cease work at an time he is called upon by the organization to do so. It i a non sequitur from this, that the member surrenders hi freedom of action. If it were not for this promise on the part of all, there could be no concert or unity of action, and the organization itself would be absolutely useless. This properly construed is merely a promise to conform his action to the requirements of the organization so far as the constitution is concerned.

It will be borne in mind that this is a voluntary association of persons employed in and around the mines, formed without capital and to which nothing of general pecuniary value was contributed as a consideration for anything done or to be done by any member or members. Its very existence is founded on the well recognized principle, that an association of persons for any purpose is more apt to be successful in its endeavor than a single person or any number of persons acting singly and independently. Realizing at the outset that without unity of action an association is no more efficient than a number of individuals, the founders of this association engaged in mutual solemn promises to each other, whereby they agreed to be bound by the rules which they themselves formulated, and from that time to the present each new member makes the same solemn promise to observe the provisions of the constitution, in consideration of the promises which have already been made by those who preceded him. And it is by virtue of these mutual promises, and these alone, that the structure of The United Mine Workers of America has been enabled to grow and to withstand the assaults that have been made upon it at various stages of its history, by various operators and associations of operators throughout the United States.

True it is, that upon becoming a member of this association and taking the obligation which all of the other members have taken, a man assents to certain restrictions upon his absolute freedom of contract in disposing of his labor, just as all the other more than three hundred thousand members have done. But is it within the province of a court to say that the benefits secured by this organization in the past to its members, and those which it may obtain for them in the future, do not constitute a sufficient reason why a laborer employed in and around > fails to show on its face anything unlawful, while on the other hand common experience teaches us that a rule of this character is essential for the preservation of labor organizations. Without a provision of this kind, there would be no power of securing concert of action; no means by which united effort could be secured for the accomplishment of the aims and purposes of the organization. In the absence of proof to the contrary, it must be assumed that this power would be exercised wisely, and only when necessary to promote the interest of the organization in a legitimate manner. It would be inconsistent with reason to assume that this power would be exercised so as to prevent the operation of a mine, which would necessarily defeat the very object for which this organization was established, to-wit: the procurement of steady employment at remunerative wages."

Coercing Non-Union Miners to Join the Union is made the second ground or reason by the learned District Court for its conclusion that the United Mine Workers of America is an unlawful organization. We are wholly at a loss to know upon what part of the record the learned District Court founds this reason. It is alleged in the bill that the United Mine Workers is a secret voluntary organization. (Record p. 6) But it is denied that it is a secret organization, and the evidence shows it not to be a secret organization. Every one of the defendants who have testified in this case show by their evidence that it is not a secret organization (testimony of Savage, 491; Lewis 531; Sullivan, 624.) These men who testified in this case have been members of this association from its organization; were officers of it and show themselves to be familiar with its organization and its workings. We are at a loss to find any evidence in the record which shows that it is the purpose of this organization to coerce non-union miners to join the union, whether they wish to do so or not.

On the subject of coercing non-union miners to join the union, the witness Savage, who has been connected with the organization since its creation, and whose evidence stands uncontradicted, says: "Knows of no one who was authorized to coerce or intimidate men to quit their employment, or anything of that kind, did not know of anybody that was representing the United Mine Workers in 1907 or any other time, going to the Hitchman mine or premises for the purpose of intimidating the men or coercing them or doing any other unlawful thing to compel the men to become members of the United Mine Workers of America; * * * they are not acting for the union if they use anything beyond reasonable persuasion." (Record p. 501.)

The witness Lewis, who has been a member of the United Mine Workers since it was founded, and who was the national President at the time he testified in this case, says: "It is not now and never has been the policy of the United Mine Workers' organization to use force or coercion or any unlawful methods to promote its jurisdiction or the growth of the organization; the moment they attempt to extend their power or usefulness by that means they will go out of existence." (Record p. 516) This same witness further says: "As to the statement of the witness, J. C. McKinley that he thinks probably the first method of promoting the growth of the United Mine Workers is to ask the operater to compel the men to join the union, Mr. Lewis says he never heard of that before; that the organization has never in its history sought to compel men to join it; that its policy is to go into a community where there is a mine and get acquainted with some of the men who work there, and talk to them about the organization and get them interested in joining; and after a sufficient number could be gotten together to agree that it was a good thing to join the union, a meeting would be called to organize those men, just the same as any other fraternal society; and if ten are gotten—it requires ten to form a union—they elect a president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer, and they would be obligated—the obligation is an open book, because anybody can get it that wants it—they would be obligated to conform to the principles of the union. Then they would go ahead and endeavor to induce other men working in that mine to join the union, until they got all the men, if possible." (Record page 528.)

As to this matter the Circuit Court of Appeals in its opinion delivered in this case, said:

> "The court below was also of the opinion that under the rules of the organization a member could be held as a slave, and thus prevented from exercising his own free will. We fail to find any provision preventing one from ceasing to work at any time he may desire, and if he should do so, he would no longer be a member of the organization. One could also cease to be a member of the union by failing to pay his dues. Under these circumstances there is no possibility of one's being held as a member of the union contrary to his wishes."

To Abrogate the Right of the Employer to Contract With His Employes Independently of the Organization.

The language of the opinion is that the rules of the organization undertake "to control or rather abrogate and destroy the right of the employer to contract with the men independent of the organization"

It is not really clear what is meant by this statement, but we believe that the learned judge means by this language that one of the purposes of the Union is to make it impossible for an operator to employ coal miners who are non-union men. This conclusion is probably reached from what is said by J. C. McKinley, one of the witnesses of petitioner, in his evidence, wherein appears the following:

> "Q. You were asked on your examination in chief the following question: 'Now, with regard to the general purpose of this union; I believe you said that as a result of your observations and experience in these joint conventions, you had found that it was the idea of the United Mine Workers organization as a national body to become supreme throughout the land in the coal mining industry?' To this question you answered as follows: 'There is no question about it; that is their desire and ambition.' What are we to understand by the expression used there that it is the idea of the United Mine Workers' organization, as a national body, to become supreme throughout the land in the coal mining industry and especially the word 'supreme' as used in that connection?

A. Their desire, as I understand it, is to have every employe in and about the bituminous coal mines of the United States and Canada, as well as the anthracite mines, a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and that they will be in position to absolutely dictate a minimum wage for which their members will work.

Q. That is your understanding?

A. Yes, sir."

(Record p. 421)

This shows that the witness understands that one of the purposes of the union is to have all persons who work in and around coal mines to become members of the union. What is unlawful in this? It is in evidence that in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois nearly all miners are members of this organization, and in many parts of several other states. If the members pursue peaceable and lawful methods of promoting the growth of the organization, will the courts interpose to prevent it? If the association is lawful, can the court limit its numbers by means of an injunction? If so, to what extent will the court permit its number to go with respect to membership? Clearly the court will not interfere in such a case.

But under the rules of the association, it matters not how large it may be, it can never dictate a minimum wage for all of its members. This is shown by the methods of forming its contracts, to which the operators must be parties, and it is only with their consent that contracts can be made with the union.

Furthermore, the different conditions incident to coal mining in the several states renders such a thing plysically impossible. This is all fully explained by the witness

Lewis. (Record pp. 515-517, and especially at pages 619-621)

It may be that the conclusion (c) of the learned district judge is reached in part by a statement appearing in the evidence of McKinley at pages 397 and 398, of the record, wherein he speaks of carpenters, engineers, firemen, machinists and blacksmiths being required to join the United Mine Workers. This is all explained by the witness Lewis and this explanation has not been called in question. (Record pp. 525-528, and 621-622)

This feature of the Union is considered by the Circuit Court of Appeals in its opinion in this case, at pages 729, 730 of the record.

To Exclude the Operator's Right to Employ Non-Union Men if He Desires.

This is the fourth reason assigned by the learned judge of the district court for holding this labor organization unlawful. If it is meant by this that one of the purposes of the United Mine Workers is to exclude the right of the operator to employ non union men by the use of coercion, threats, intimidation or violence, then such a purpose would be unlawful. It would be unlawful independent of the union. Not even a single individual could employ such methods to prevent an operator from employing non-union men.

There is no evidence in the record of this case, even tending to show that the respondents have used any such method to prevent the petitioner from employing non-union men. The petitioner is asserting his right to employ non-union men, and declares he will not employ union labor. It has formed an agreement with its men not to employ union labor, and they have united with the petitioner in an agreement not to join the United Mine Workers. Now, cannot the United Mine Workers use peaceable and lawful methods to induce the petitioner to employ only union labor? That is all that has been done with reference to the business of petitioner.

(e)

To Limit the Right of the Employer, in the Absence of Contract, to Discharge Whom he Pleases, When he Pleases, and for What he Sees Fit.

is stated in the opinion as one of the purposes of this organization as appears to the learned judge of the District Court from a study of its rules, and as one of the grounds upon which he holds it to be an unlawful association. (Record p. 687)

We have examined the constitutions of the international, district and sub-district organization and find no provisions in them justifying such a conclusion. It must arise from what is said by the witness McKinley.

This witness is a coal operator in West Virginia and Ohio, (record pp. 388, 387) a member of the Coal Operators' Association, (record p. 395) and its vice-president, (same page) is President of the Richland Coal Company, a majority stockholder, and the Richland Coal Company has a suit against the same persons who are defendants in the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company case, (Record p. 420). So this witness is in effect testifying in his own case.

Now, let us see what his testimony is on this phase of the case. This appears in the record at pp. 394, 398, 402, 403, 407 (cross-ex.) 496.

It will be seen from an examination of the evidence of this witness at the pages referred to, that it was the purpose of the United Mine Workers of America in 1907, to unionize the men working in and around the mines of the Panhandle district of West Virginia—that is, to get the men who were employed at these mines to become members of this labor organization. Did this organization, in the use of moral suasion and argument or any other lawful means, have the right to induce these employes to join this labor union, or in a lawful manner try to induce these employes to join this union?

All the authorities say they do have this right.

In My Maryland Lodge v. Adt, (Md.) 68 L. R. A. at page 757, the court, speaking of labor unions, says:

> "They may even use persuasion to have others join their organization. They have an unquestionable right to present their cause to the public in newspapers or circulars in a peaceable way, but with no attempt at coercion. If ruin to the employer results from their peaceable assertion of these rights, it is a damage without remedy."

In Beck v. Railway, etc., Union, 48 Mich. 497, 74 Am. St. Rep. 421, (pt. 2. syl.) and in its opinion at p. 424, the court says:

> "The law protects them (employers) in the right to employ whom they please, at prices they and their employes can agree upon, and to discharge them at the expiration of their term of service or for violation of their contracts. This right must be maintained, or personal liberty is a sham. So, also, the laborers have the right to fix a price upon their labor, and to refuse to work unless that price is obtained. Singly, or in combination, they have this right. They may organize in order to improve their condition and secure better wages. They may use persuasion to induce men to join their organization, or to refuse to work except for an established wage. They may present their cause to the public in newspapers or circulars, in a peaceable way, and with no attempt at coercion. If the effect in such case is ruin to the employer, it is damnum absque injuria, for they have only exercised their legal rights. The law does not permit either party to use force, violence, threats of force or violence, intimidation, or coercion."

And there are a large number of other cases holding that labor organizations, have this right, and may lawfully exercise it; that is, they must do so without coercion, intimidation, threats or violence, among which are the following:

Everett Waddy Co. v. Typographical Union, 105 Va. 188, 53 S. E. 273, Am. & Eng. Ann Cas. 793; United States v. Weber, 114 Fed. 950; Longshore Printing & Publishing Co. v. Howell, (Or.) 28 L. R. A. 464, in opinion at p. 472; Kolley v. Robinson, 187 Fed. 415, 109 C. C. A. 247.

Now, if labor unions have this right, why does the petitioner seek to have this organization enjoined from the use of peaceful and lawful methods to induce its employees to join the union?

To this it submits two answers:

(a) If enough of the men are induced to join the union, these men will organize as a local union at our mines and will ultimately refuse to work with the non-union men, and upon our refusal to recognize the union, the men will strike, thus causing our mines to be shut down, because we will not contract with union labor.

Now, on this theory they have been lawfully organized as a union, without the use of violence, coercion, threats or intimidation, and are at work as union men. After this fact has been peacefully accomplished they requst or demand, as a condition, that the mine be run as a union mine, else they will quit work, as they will not work with non-union men. Have the members of a labor organization this right?

The answer must be in the affirmative because the decisions so hold.

Gray v. Building Trades Council et al., 91 Minn. 171, 1 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 172, 177; Kemp. v. Division No 241, etc., 255 Ill 213, 29 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 347, citing Jersey City Printing Co. v. Cassidy, 63 N. J. Eq. 759, 53 Atl. 230 and Booth v. Burgess, 72 N. J. Eq. 181, 65 Atl. 226.

But the petitioner cannot show or anticipate now that the effort of the union to get the employes of petitioners to become members of the United Mine Workers, is for the sole purpose of compelling it to recognize the union, and upon failing to do so the union employes will go upon a strike and thus interfere with the business of the petitioner.

Such fact is too remote upon which to predicate an allegation of imminent and threatened injury authorizing an injunction to inhibit the respondents from using lawful methods to persuade the employes of the petitioner to become members of the United Mine Workers of America.

To attain this end the court must prohibit the use of lawful methods by the union to increase its membership and thus strengthen it as a labor union. This no court has ever done, or will ever do in this country

(b) But the petitioner says further, in answer to our contention that we have a right to use reasonable argument and persuasion with its non-union employes, to induce them to become members of the United Mine Workers, that these employes have, by agreement with petitioner,—united with it—to keep out of its mine workmen who belong to this union. Petitioner says it is a contract, and that the respondents by the use of argument and persuation are thus endeavoring to induce petitioner's employes to break it. The reply to this argument appears in this brief at pp. 54-62, and the fact that the respondents prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit, had no knowledge of this contract and its terms and that this contract did not then exist is alone a sufficient answer to this contention of petitioner.

(f)

To assume the right on the part of the Organization, through its officers, (1) to control the Employer's business, (2) to shut down his mine by calling out the men in obedience to their obligation, whenever it is deemed to the interest of the Union regardless of the employer's interests, or the effect that such act may have upon him as regards loss, damage or necessary violations, on account thereof, of his existing contracts with others.

(Record p. 687.)

This is the last ground specified by the learned District Court upon which the conclusion is based that the constitutions of the international, district and sub-district associations make this labor organization unlawful

Analyzing this statement we find that it embraces two matters attributable to the rules or principles of the organization, which must be found in its constitution.

These matters are:

(1) The control of the employer's business by the organization.

(2) The shutting down of his mine by calling out his employees in obedience to the obligation of the members of the organization whenever deemed to the interests of the union to do so.

(3) The loss to the employer incident to the doing of the acts mentioned in numbers (1) and (2).

Let us examine the record to ascertain whether there can be found in any part of these constitutions, a rule or provision authorizing the control of the employer's business by the organization. It may be fairly assumed that the district court in its opinion has set forth the objectionable parts of the constitutions enumerated in the opinion at pp. 681-687. of the record.

Examining these parts of the different constitutions, there is nothing disclosed that indicates that it is a part of the policy of the organization to control the business of the employer. So from an examination of the parts of the constitutions set forth in this opinion, it is perceived that they do not disclose it to be the policy or purpose of the union to shut down the mine of an employer whenever the organization believes that it is to its interests to do so.

The conclusion of the learned district court set forth under sub-division (f) must have been reached from some parts of the record relating to the personal experience of Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, while it ran its mine union, and that of the witness McKinley with the Richland mine, and possibly some other mines with which he was connected.

Now, as to the control of the employer's business. The only thing complained of by the president and general manager of the petitioner is that incident to some strikes which arose during the time petitioner was carrying on its business under a contract with the United Mine Workers of America.

An examination of the testimony of the witness, Hitchman, the president of the Company, disloses that before the scale of wages adopted by the national organization could be adjusted and signed by the petitioner, that the men ceased to work awaiting adjustment and signing of the scale by it. It appears that when this scale expired, which was on the 31st day of March, 1906, the petitioner through its president, Mr. Hitchman, and its superintendent, Mr. Koch, were desirous of continuing in the union, and endeavoring to make temporary arrangements to that end, but by reason of difficulties and some obstacles in the way of an earlier adjustment, they were unable to do so, and early in June determined to run non-union. That the officers of the petitioner were satisfied and were willing to continue to run union, it is only necessary to refer to their evidence, especially at pages 250, 253, 287.

It would seem from this testimony a little singular that the petitioner was willing to continue on the union basis at the expiration of the scale on March 31, 1906, if mining coal under union rules was so objectionable as is now sought to be made to appear. Furthermore, as we have already seen in the brief, (ante p. 56), the petitioner continued to pay the same price that the union scale called for, and to work pratically under the same conditions. If the petitioner had no control of its employes under union conditions, it is strange that it was willing to remain under those conditions from 1903 to 1906, and then pay the same wages when it began work again by running non-union, and continue to take upon itself practically the same conditions that existed while running union.

From the standpoint of the petitioner itself there is certainly no well founded claim or ground for saying that the union was controlling its employes. Turning to the testimony of the witness McKinley at pages 465, 474-482, this witness says on page 465, speaking of the United Mine Workers, that "They term a union mine as one over which they have absolute control, and a non-union mine one which is worked open shop, or in which the United Mine Workers are not recognized." This is the strongest language that is found in the testimony of the witness McKinley, but taken with the qualification that appears in it, it does not bear out the deduction found under (f) in this brief.

The Court's attention is directed to the testimony of the witness Savage appearing at page 587, relative to this matter, and the testimony of Lewis at pages 607, 614, 616, and and Sullivan, page 740.

A careful examination of the evidence fails to disclose that it is the policy of the United Mine Workers of America, either in the rules of its organization or the means employed to make them effectual, to control the business of the employer.

An examination of the record further discloses that one of the main purposes of the organization is to fix a fair scale of wages that shall be uniform, so far as possible, taking into consideration the varied conditions that exist in the different sections of the coal mining territory, and have this scale fixed by agreement, of course, between the operators and the coal miners, the latter acting through the medium of their representatives, being an officer of the United Mine Workers of America. The contract to be made, of course, for all men engaged in mining coal, according to the labor being performed in and around the mine; of course, the price depends upon local conditions, but so far as possible to make it uniform, that is one of the objects of the organization. (Record pp. 732, 733.) If differences arise between the employer and his men or any of them, the policy of the organization is to adjust them by an impartial hearing between the operator and the employe or employes affected, the work of mining still going on pending such investigation. If it turns out that the employe is in fault, then of course he is discharged by the management of the mine. If not, he is reinstated. It will be remembered that this is all done by agreement between the operator and the miner. All other matters, as for instance, insufficient ventilation, the presence of noxious gases in the mine, incompetent fellow workmen, when these are made the subject of complaint or disagreement, are disposed of in the same way. This is one of the benefits to be derived from the organization. On the other hand, if the operator has made his contract not collectively, but individually with each employe and the employe makes any complaint, and this complaint is treated with indifference, the miner is helpless, so that he must either work on under conditions that ought not to exist, or he must quit his employment and find work elsewhere. He is then confronted with a difficulty that is hard to meet. If he be a man of family, he must find another place to work. He must then remove his family to that place or be separated from them. He must raise the money for that purpose, and thus take the bread perhaps, and shelter and comfort from his family, in an endeavor to find a place where he can toil at his daily labor. The matter of having this condition looked after collectively by his organization instead of individually is of prime importance to the miner, and if the operator is dealing with his men collectively it is of importance to him, because he must conform to his agreement with them, comply with the law requiring him to use proper appliances, and all other means for making the mine sanitary and free from danger, and this is one of the main reasons why some of the operators in West Virginia are fighting against recognizing organized labor.

The West Virginia Reports contain a number of cases where miners have been killed or maimed for life by reason of conditions existing in and about the mines, wherein suit was brought for damages, and the administrator representing of course the surviving widow and children, or the poor maimed miner himself suing, were turned out of court, as it appeared that the operator had employed a competent mine boss, and therefore he was relieved from all liability, and the complaint, just though it was from the standpoint of the widow and children of the party killed, or of the maimed miner, did not avail to relieve their wants and in some measure repair the injury. And, furthermore, there are even cases where the party injured had made complaint prior to the injury, of defective timbers and other omissions upon the part of the operator, to the mine boss, and no attention paid to it until it was too late for the unfortunate miner to save himself.

The answer to all this by the operator is, that he did not have to work in a bad or dangerous mine, forgetting that the expense of finding any other working place for a miner and his family is a matter of grave concern to him, and being dependent upon his daily labor, he is unable to do what a man of means would otherwise do. This organization looks after these matters in the interests of its members, and this is one of the wise and humane purposes of this organization. The state itself is interested in this sort of an organization, and as has already been said and shown in this brief, labor organizations are lawful in West Virginia.

Now, as to the second matter,—shutting down the mine by calling out the men in obedience to their obligation—this simply means a strike; it can mean nothing else. There are no circumstances under which men may not quit work in a body if they so desire. If they are under a specific agreement not to quit until a certain time, and they break the contract by quitting, they do not commit a tort but simply a breach of contract. They cannot be enjoined from quitting, even under such circumstances; but if they quit without reason or sufficient ground, they are civilly liable. If they are not under any definite term of employment then they are at liberty to quit at any time, and the employer is at liberty to discharge them at any time. Of course, when a local union of organized men, which is one of the units of the national organization of the United Mine Workers of America, makes an agreement with the operator it is their duty to live up to it, and this is what was meant by Mr. Koch, a witness in this case for the petitioner, and the general superintendent of the petitioner, when he said that when he discovered that his men in 1903 desired to join the union he told them he had no objection but wanted them to live up to its rules. Witness evidently referred to the agreement proposed by the United Mine Workers of America to the operators in Sub-District 5, in the territory in which the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company's plant is located, when he made this statement.

In answer to some of the reasons assigned by the learned district judge for the illegality of this union, wherein it is stated that its rules limit the right of the employer to discharge whom he pleases, to control his business and requires him to shut down his mine by calling out the men whenever the union feels so inclined, the Court here is referred to a copy or substantially a copy of the agreement used between the operator and the association, known as "The Official Mining Scale Between Operators and United Mine Workers of America for the Panhandle District of West Virginia. A copy of this as changed and adopted by the petitioner as its mining scale, appears in the record as "Koch's Exhibit No. 7", and this exhibit is handed to the witness and he is asked to state what it is, and the witness replies: "The printed part of it was an old scale that we changed the figures on, with an advance of 5.55 per cent, and struck out the part pertaining to the U. M. W. of A. and the men were paid by it for the two years, or the part of the two years, that we worked." (Record p. 330). Now turning to page 338 of the record, we find that Rule No. 10, which is stricken out by the petitioner in its contract with its men, reads as follows:

> "Rule No. 10. No strikes shall take place at any time under the jurisdiction of Sub District 5 of District 6, except for specific violation of agreement. That is, screens irregular; failure to pay on payday without explanations; violation of mining laws by operators, or reductions from scale wages until the grievances of the mine affected have been thoroughly investigated by the officers of Districts 6, U. M. W. of A. and operators interested. Any man or men that cause a stoppage of work at any mime in violation of this rule, shall be subject to dismissal of the company."

Under this agreement, it will be perceived, the causes for strikes, or the grounds which will authorize strikes are set forth.

With reference to this feature of the case, the Circuit Court of Appeals in its opinion most aptly said:

> "Another ground relied upon by the court below is that the organization assumes the right through its officers, (1) to control the employers business, (2) to shut down his mine by calling out men in obedience to their obligation whenever it is deemed to be to the interest of the union, regardless of the employer's interest, or the effect that such act may have upon him as regards loss, damage or necessary violation, on account thereof, of his existing contracts with others.

Relative to this question the witness, McKinley, a member of the plaintiff organization, testified, among other things, that it was a desire of the union, as he understood it, to have every employe in and about the bituminous coal mines of the United States and Canada, as well as the Anthracite mines, a member of the United Mine Workers of America. It is admitted to be the purpose of this organization to induce all miners to join the union, and until the contrary is shown, it must be assumed that only lawful methods are to be employed by it for that purpose.

Witness Lewis also testified that "it is not now, and never has been the policy of the United Mine Workers' organization to use force or coercion or any unlawful methods to promote its jurisdiction or the growth of the organization, and the moment they attempt to extend their power or usefulness by that means instantly they will go out of existence." The witness further testifying says: "As to the statement of the witness, J. C. McKinley, that he thinks probably the first method of promoting the growth of the United Mine Workers is to ask the operators to compel the men to join the union," says he "never heard of that before; that its policy is to go into a community where there is a mine and get acquainted with some of the men who work there and talk to them about the organization and get them interested in joining; and after a sufficient number could be gotten together to agree that it was a good thing to join the union, a meeting would be called to organize those men, just the same as any other fraternal society."

In this connection, it should be borne in mind that the defendants as members of this organization cannot secure employment in any mine without first entering into an agreement with operators as to the terms upon which they are to work. In other words, it is optional with the operators as to whether they shall operate their mines, and further as to whether they shall employ union labor.

It is also insisted by the court below that under these rules the operator has no right to employ non-union men even if he should desire to do so.

If the United Mine Workers of America in pursuance of this rule should resort to coercion, threats, intimidation or violence for the purpose of preventing the mine owners from employing non union men, such conduct would be unlawful, and the courts would promptly restrain any one who might be a party ts such transaction. Indeed it would be unlawful for an individual to undertake, by coercion, intimidation, or threats to prevent a mine owner from exercising his own free will as to the employment of non-union laborers, or as to any other thing which he might deem necessary to be done in order to protect his property rights.

However, in this instance, the plaintiff has adopted a policy by which only non-union men may be employed. If the plaintiff may for the purpose of protecting its interests adopt a policy by which only non-union men can secure employment at its mines, and such conduct be sanctioned by the law, by what process of reasoning can it be held that the defendants may not adopt the same method in order to protect their interests. If the plaintiff is to be protected in the use of such methods, and the defendants are to be restrained from using lawful methods for the purpose of successfully meeting the issue thus raised by the plaintiff, then indeed it may be truthfully said that capital receives greater protection at the hands of the courts than those through whose efforts capital in the first instance was created. But such is not the law, and when we consider the testimony as respects the conduct of the defendants, at and before the institution of this suit, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff has not by a preponderance of the evidence, shown that these defendants employed unlawful methods as alleged in the bill.

At one time this identical mine employed union labor, and in all probability would have continued to do so, had it not been for a controversy which arose as to certain adjustments and the parties failing to reach an agreement the plaintiff decided to employ only non-union labor.

It further appears that the plaintiff is paying the non-union men the same wages that are to be paid union men. Therefore, under these cimcumstances, is it not as reasonable to infer that the plaintiff is endeavoring to place the laborers of that section in a position where it would be master of the situation, as it is to infer that the defendants are seeking to destroy the business of the plaintiff?

While it is true that the plaintiff has a perfect right to refuse to employ union labor is it not equally true that union labor, as we have stated, may by the employment of legitimate means, do that which is necessary to keep its forces together?

Surely we have not reached the point when capital with its strong arm may adopt a plan like this for protecting its interests, while on the other hand the laboring classes are to be denied the protection of the law when they are attempting to assert rights that are just as important to their well-being as are the rights of those who have been more fortunate, in accumalating wealth. He who "seeks equity must do equity." In other words he "must come into court with clean hands" If the courts of this country should by injunctive relief protect the mine owner in the enjoyment of his property rights, and restrain the laboring people from organizing their forces by declaring such organizations unlawful, would not the mine owner then be in a position to control the situation so that he who has to toil for his daily bread would be placed in a position where if he exists at all, he must do so at such wages, and upon such terms as organized capital may see fit to dictate? However, we do not wish to be understood as intimating that the plaintiff or a majority of those who employ labor in this country would take advantage of a situation of this kind for the purpose of oppressing those who are at their mercy. The instances where such a course is pursued are exceptional. Thousands of manufacturing plants all over the country, as well as railroad companies and mining companies are today of their own accord employing union labor, realizing as they do that such a policy on their part is to the advantage of the employer as well as the employee. In fact, under our constitution and laws, no undue advantages are given to either capital or labor, nor will the courts even permit individuals or labor organizations by force, fraud or intimidation to prevent the mine owner from lawfully protecting his rights, but while this is true, equal protection should be guaranteed to labor and capital.

It was further held by the court below that under the rules of the organization the power is given to limit the right of the employer in the absence of contract to discharge whom he pleases, when he pleases, and for what he pleases. A careful examination of the constitution of the National, District and Sub-District organizations fails to disclose anything to justify this conclusion.

We have carefully examined the constitution to ascertain whether there can be found therein a rule or provision which authorizes the control of the employer's business by the organization, but find nothing to sustain this view, unless it be based on certain incidents in connection with the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company while it ran its mines union."

The United Mine Workers of America do not Constitute a Monopoly.

It is argued that the United Mine Workers of America are an unlawful organization because they have not been confined within proper bounds. It is said their sphere is national; that they aim to be and are a monopoly. Does not the same argument apply to the United Brotherhood of carpenters and Joiners, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen, and every other labor union throughout this country, and which have been decided to be lawful whenever and wherever their legality as associations has been called in question?

This argument assumes that the national organization dictates the prices, terms and conditions upon which coal shall be mined throughout the entire conntry.

The Constitution or By-Laws of the United Mine Workers of America.

The constitution of the national and subordinate branches of the United Mine Workers of America containing a statement of its purposes and the rules for their regulation and government, are the by-laws of the Union.

It is well settled by the courts and law writers that a labor union has the right to make, and enforce by penalties, rules and by-laws for the government of its members.

Martin, Modern Law of Labor Unions, §150, pp. 206, 207, §§280-293, pp. 357-368.

"Now the general rule is well settled that a labor union or other voluntary association, has the right to make rules and by-laws for the government of its members and the regulation of their conduct in respect of matters affecting the common welfare, and to punish its members, by fine, suspension or expulsion, according to the gravity of the offense, for disobedience of such rules and by-laws, or orders made in accordance therewith by officers vested with the requisite authority, or for conduct in violation of the fundamental objects of the union, the right being subject to the limitation that it cannot make and enforce, rules and by-laws which are in contravention of the laws or of public policy. And the constitution, rules and by-laws of a union constitute a contract between the union and its members. The right to make and enforce rules and by-laws for the government of its members is essential to the existence of any union or association, for if each member may determine his own line of conduct for himself without responsibility of any character to the organi> zation to which he belongs, and owes his allegiance, then, it is, in a large measure, shorn of its power to accomplish the objects for which it was formed."

> Martin, Modern Law of Labor Unions, §150, pp. 206, 207.

In Jetton-Denkle Lumber Co. v. Mather, 53 Fla. 969, 43 So. 590, a temporary injunction was issued against certain striking employes inhibiting them from preventing non-union men from entering the complainant's employ, and thereafter the injunction was modified, and one paragraph of the order modifying the injunction was in the following words:

> "It is ordered and decreed that the temporary injunction issued herein on May 5th, ult., be modified as follows: That the said defendants, and each of them, their members, officers, agents, and representatives, and each and every one of them, be, and they are hereby, restrained and enjoined,
> "(1) From using any means, methods, or devices whatever to intimidate or to prevent, by any kind of threats, violence, or coercion, any person or persons, whether members of any labor union or not, from accepting employment from the complainant in any capacity."

The case with its modifications was, upon appeal, affirmed, and in disposing of appellant's objection to the modification of the injunction order as made by the court below, the Supreme Court of Florida said:

> "But, says the appellant, these labor unions, under the modification, can use moral suasion, moral coercion, upon their respective members by fines and threats of expulsion. This was a risk voluntarily assumed by the members entering the unions, and if no longer willing to pay the price, if the advantages derived are not equal to the burdens assumed, each member has a perfect right to withdraw from the union, to seek to get back his former employment, and to be protected therein by the injunction still in force."

The law as to the duties of members to obey the rules and regulations of the association to which they belong is well set forth by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in L. D. Willcutt & Sons Co. v. Driscoll, 200 Mass. 110, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1236, 85 N. E. 897, in the opinion of that court:

> "When one chooses voluntarily to unite with others of the same craft in forming an organization for the purpose of bringing about by the united action of all its members more favorable conditions of employment, he is bound, so long as he desires to remain a member of that organization, to submit within certain limits his own freedom alike of judgment and of action to the judgment of his associates, and to conform his conduct to that standard which they shall have agreed to be for the best interest of all and of each. Unity of action would be impossible upon any other terms."

In Wabash R. Co. v. Hannahan, 121 Fed. Rep. 563, the court said:

> "It is contended that the threatened strike was resorted to by the defendants, not in good faith to redress grievances or secure desired concessions, but as a result of a combination and conspiracy to accomplish the ulterior purpose of securing recognition of their unions or brotherhoods, as authoritative agents or representatives of its members, in all their dealings with the company, and also to unionize the roads of the company, and that the defendants did not honestly and fairly secure the two-thirds vote of the brotherhood employes in favor of the strike, but did secure the same by coercion, misrepresentation, and fraud.
> "An interesting and able argument in support of this contention is drawn from the provisions of the constitution and general rules of the two brotherhoods involved in this litigation, whereby it is made to appear that a strike may be declared which will have the effect of forcing the minority of the brotherhood members who vote against it and also all non-union employes in service upon the road of the employer out of work without their consent and even against their wishes. Attention is particularly called to the situation disclosed by the proof in this case, that a large majority of complainant's employes working on roads east of the Mississippi river, for whose special benefit largely the threatened strike was intended, voted against it; and it is argued that these and other like considerations disclose that the necessary operative results of the system and methods of the brotherhoods in question are subversive alike of the fundamental rights of the employer to manage his own business, and of the employes to bestow their labor as they will.

"This kind of argument enters deeply into the domain of political science, and might well be addressed to a body of constructive statesmen or men originally contemplating a labor organization. It is an argument that would be pertinent against the organization of society into government. The will of the individual must consent to yield to the will of the majority, or no organization either of society into government, capital into combination, or labor into coalition can ever be effected. The individual must yield in order that the many may receive a greater benefit. The right of labor to organize for lawful purposes and by organic agreement to subject the individual members to rules, regulations, and conduct prescribed by the majority is no longer an open question in the jurisprudenc of this country. I entirely agree with the view expressed on this subject by Judge Taft in Thomas v. Railway Company, supra, hereinbefore quoted."

In Longshore Printing Co. v. Howell, 26 Or. 527, 46 Am. St. Rep. 640, the court, in discussing the question of the rights of labor unions, said:

"It must be understood, however, that these associations like other voluntary societies, must depend for their membership upon the free and untrammeled choice of each individual member. No resort can be had to compulsory methods of any kind either to increase, keep up, or retain such membership. Nor is it permissible for associations of this kind to enforce the observance of their laws, rules, and regulations through violence, threats, or intimidation, or to employ any methods that would induce intimidation or deprive persons of perfect freedom of action. Such organizations may be preserved and their membership augmented by reasoning and fair arguments, and even by persuesion and entreaty, and an observance of their adopted constitutions and by-laws may be exacted through the same peaceful means, but beyond this it is not advisable from a legal standpoint to venture."

"Subject to limitations to be considered in a a subsequent section, labor unions have the undoubted right to make rules and by-laws for the government of their members, and for the regulation of their conduct towards each other in matters affecting the general interests of the body, and to enforce observance of such rules and by-laws may make disobedience thereof punishable by fine, suspension or expulsion according to the gravity of the offence. As has been said in a well considered case, the right of labor unions by organic agreement to subject the individual members to rules, regulations, and conduct, prescribed by the majority, is no longer an open question in the jurisprudence of this country. The will of the individual must yield to the will of the majority, or no organization whether of society into government, capital into combination, or labor into coalition can ever be effectual. The individual must yield in order that the many may receive a greater benefit. This principle has been directly applied in the case of strikes ordered by the union. It has been held that the union may order its members to strike or continue on strike on pain of fine, suspension or expulsion if the strike is a lawful one, and impose such penalties for disobedience of its orders. As regards other specific rules, which may be adopted, it has been held that a union may adopt a scale of wages, for which members may work, and may adopt by-laws providing that any member found guilty by its committee of working for less prices than those fixed by the union, shall forfeit a certain per cent of the price fixed for the same work, the penalty to be collected in the name of the association by process of law. So a union may adopt rules whereby members are prohibited from working with non-union men, or for an employer whose methods of conducting his business is antagonistic to the interests of the union, or for employers who do not pay their employes weekly, and for the apportionment of apprentices among employers of its members according to the number of workmen. By parity of reasoning the members may bind themselves as to their membership and rights in such societies, and the funds of the same, by the constitution, and by-laws of the association which they adopt, or subscribe to after adoption."

Martin, Modern Law of Labor Unions, §280, pp. 357-359, and the many cases cited in support of the text.

The only limitation upon the right and power of a labor union to make rules and by laws for the government and regulation of its members, is that they must not be in contravention of the law, either common, statutory, or organic, or against public policy.

Martin, Modern Law of Labor Unions, §§281-285, and cases cited.

No Part or Provisions of the National, District or Sub-District Constitutions are in Violation of the Laws of West Virginia.

If the constitutions of the United Mine Workers of America and its subordinate branches, as a whole, are not violative of the constitution and laws of West Virginia, what specific part or provision thereof violates the laws or constitution of that State?

We submit, in view of what has already been said in this brief, as to the purposes of this Union and the right of a labor union to adopt rules and by-laws for the government and regulation of its own membership, that there is no provision in the said constitutions that is per se against the laws or constitution of West Virginia.

Furthermore, the court in a suit in equity by a private person would not, as an abstract question or proposition, declare any particular clause or provision of the constitution of this labor union unlawful under the laws and constitution of West Virginia, but would do so only when the union in attempting to carry out such clause or provision, if unlawful, against the property rights of the petitioner would thereby threaten injury or damage to such rights, as equity will only interpose its aid to protect the property of the party complaining.

The United Mine Workers Not a Combination or Comspiracy in Restraint of Trade within the Contemplation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law.

Our position is that the questton whether or not the union, known as the United Mine Workers of America, is a combination or conspiracy within the purview of the Act of Congress of April 2, 1890, 26 Stat. L. 209, generally known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, does not properly arise in this case for the consideration and decision of the Court We say that this question does not arise here for two reasons:

The first is, that there is no allegation in the pleadings raising an issue with reference to the unlawfulness of this organization under the Act of Congress referred to.

The second is, that a private person, as the petitioner here is, cannot attack the validity of a combination or conspiracy under the Sherman Anti Trust Law, and can only enjoin an act or acts of such a combination when these acts threaten injury to the property rights of an individual.

The law only authorizes a suit in equity by the United States at the instance of the Attorney General. In support of the proposition that the petitioner cannot maintain this suit in order to declare the organization to which the respondents belong, unlawful under the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, the attention of the Court is respectfully directed to the case of National Fireprooting Co. v. Mason Builders' Association, 169 Fed. 259, where the court in the course of its opinion says:

> "But the complainant asserts that the agreement in this case is positively unlawful and not merely negatively invalid—that it contravenes both national and state statutes against combinations, and thus does give rights of action to injured persons. With respect to the Fed. statute, it is not obvious in what way a trade agreement between builders and blicklayers, relating to their work in the state of New York, can be said to directly affect interstate commerce; but the consideration of this question is not necessary because a person by a violation of the federal act cannot sue for an injunction under it. The injunctive remedy is available to the government only. An individual can only sue for threefold damages. Greer v. Stoller (C. C.) 77 Fed 2; Southern Indiana Exp. Co. v. United States Exp. Co. (C. C.) 88 Fed. 663. See, also, Bement v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S 87, 22 Sup. Ct. 747, 46 L. Ed. 1058; Port V. Southern Railway Co., 103 Tenn. 184, 52 S. W. 301, 55 L R. A. 481; Metcalf v. American School Furniture Co. (C. C.) 108 Fed. 909; Block v. Standard Distilling, etc., Co (C. C.) 95 Fed. 978; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Miami Steamship Co., 86 Fed 407, 30 C. C A. 142; Pidcock v. Harrington (C. C.) 64 Fed. 821; Hagan v. Blindell, 56 Fed. 696, 6 C. C. A. 86, affirming Blindell v. Hagan (C. C.) 54 Fed. 40."

The learned Circuit Court of Appeals did not decide the question now under discussion, as it did not regard it as one properly arising in this case.

If this Honorable Court should conclude that this question is now before it for decision we submit that this labor union is not in violation of the Act of Congress of April 2, 1890, making combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations unlawful.

There is no decision that has come to our notice that holds that a labor organization, per se, is in contravention of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. There are cases that hold that where two or more persons institute a boycott, or engage in unlawful acts by the use of intimidation, threats, coercion and violence to promote the purposes of a strike, when such boycotts or strikes involve an interference with interstate commerce, that the persons engaged in such acts cannot protect themselves against this law merely because they are members of a labor organization and are engaged in such acts in promoting its interests. The following are the cases so holding:

United States v. Debs, 64 Fed. 724;
United States v. Elliott, 64 Fed. 27;
Thomas v. Cincinnati, etc., R. Co., 62 Fed. 803;
In re Grand Jury, 62 Fed. 840;

United States v. Workingmen's Amalgamated Council, 64 Fed. 995;
Waterhouse v. Comer, 55 Fed. 149;
Loewe v. Lawlor, 208 U. S. 274, 52 Law. Ed. 488.

In these cases, and all others of like kind, there was no holding that a labor organization per se is contrary to the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. The reason must be that the purposes of these associations are not to restrain interstate commerce, or to stifle competition, or even to create monopoly; but on the contrary, they have for their purpose the betterment of the condition of the laboring man, on the principle that laboring men can, by the formation of associations and unions, accomplish the lawful purpose of bettering their condition much more effectively than to attempt to do so alone or singly.

We have already shown in a general way the purpose for which a labor organization may be created and its growth promoted. For a full discussion of the internal administration of labor unions, their constitutions, rules and by-laws, adopted for the purpose of promoting the business of the organization, we refer the Court to Martin on the Modern Law of Labor Unions, §§ 279-345, where this subject is extensively treated and the authorities cited. We are unable to perceive any clauses, or sections thereof, in the national, district and sub-district constitutions that are within themselves unlawful.

It is not denied, but admitted, that if coercion, intimidation, violence, or physical force of any kind is employed to promote the growth of this organization, then the means thus employed would render the persons thus employing such means, whether members of the association or not, guilty of a tort, and in a proper case could be enjoined from committing threatened injury to property. But, as we have seen, no such agencies have been employed in this case by the respondents. In order to determine whether the United Mine Workers, as an organization, is within the purview of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, let us examine into

The real purposes of this organization and how these purposes are made effective.

As we have already seen, the national organization which has a membership of nearly three hundred thousand, which is made up of the members of the various local unions throughout the country, has nothing whatever to do in fixing a wage basis for any particular district. The method of arriving at this is in a joint conference between the operators and the members of the organization within a particular district. A district may embrace one state or a part of a state, or one state and a part of another state, depending, of course, upon the extent of the membership of the organization in that district and the number of operators therein. When the representatives of the operators and the representatives of the miners meet in joint conference, the latter submit a proposition to the former embodying the price of mining coal per ton or per measurement, and the price of day wages, and this proposition is discussed, and may be accepted as submitted, modified, or rejected by the operators. If no agreement is reached, an adjourned or future meeting is sometimes called for a further consideration. If the proposition is ultimately accepted, then that agreement becomes the basis of action within the district in fixing the price of mining coal and of day wages in and about the mines. That becomes a scale of wages for the action of the sub-districts within the district and the miners and operators within the sub-districts adapt it to the conditions existing in any sub-district within the territory of the district. When this agreement is finally consummated by such modifications as will adapt the scale to the sub-district, the operator and the local union whose members are mining coal for that operator are in contractual relations. This scale containing the price and conditions upon which the miners are working continues for a definite period, and contains many provisions regulating the mutual rights of the parties.

It will thus be perceived that the very essence of the organization, in its practical operation, is the local union whose members are at work in and about the mine under the rules and regulations of the United Mine Workers of America.

In its practical operations, it thus becomes, through the members of its local unions, employed in locally mining coal for some operator in some sub-district, within the territory of some particular state.

It will thus be further perceived, that the members of the United Mine Workers of America are not engaged in inter-state commerce. The operator himself, in taking his coal out, through the agency of the labor of these miners, who are members of the United Mine Workers of America, is not, in the things done by his employes, engaged necessarily in inter-state commerce.

To render a combination unlawful under the Act of July 2, 1890, it must appear that such combination was formed for the purpose of restraining trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations, or that such restraint necessarily results from such combination, and thus deprives the public of the benefits which flow from free competition.

United States v. Freight Ass'n, 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007;
Northern Securities Company v. U. S., 193 U. S 197, 48 L. ed. 709;
Bigelow v. Calumet & Hecla Min. Co., 167 Fed. 709;
Gibbs v. McNeely, 118 Fed. 120;
Whitwell v. Continental Tobacco Co., 125 Fed. 454.

These, and all the authorities, hold that to vitiate a combination, its purpose or necessary effect must be to restrain commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations.

The size of a business alone does not constitute a monopoly in restraint of inter-state commerce in violation of section 2 of the Anti-Trust Act; but to render a combination illegal thereunder it must intentionally or necessarily prevent other persons from engaging in such business, thereby stifling competition.

U. S. v. American Naval Stores Co., 172 Fed. 458;
In re Green, 52 Fed. 104.

The authorities all hold that a combination which does not exclude other persons from engaging in the same business does not create a monopoly. As long as other persons are free to go into the same business, and compete with the person engaged in the combination, there is no ground for complaint.

National Fireproofing Co. v. Mason Builders' Ass'n, 169 Fed. 259.

The case just cited, decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals in 1909, involved the validity of an agreement entered into between the Mason Builders' Association and the Bricklayers' Union, and it was contended that it unlawfully interfered with the business and property of the complainant. The court, after stating the agreement, and its effect upon the business of the complainant, and citing the authorities holding that a private person cannot resort to injunction for the dissolution of a combination, but that his remedy is for three-fold damages, in the course of the opinion, says:

> "The complainant says that the agreement in question violates this statute because it tends to create a monopoly in the hands of members of the association and other general contractors who comply with its provisions. It may well be doubted, however, whether a combination of employers and employes in the building trade could ever be for the purpose of creating a monopoly 'in the manufacture, production or sale in this state, of any article or commodity of common use.' Be that as it may, the thing that is essential to the existence of a monopoly—the concentration of business in the hands of a few—is not present here. The business of installing fireproofing in the city of New York is open to all who choose to engage in it under existing economic conditions. General contractors cannot be said to have a monopoly when any person can be a general contractor. Members of the unions cannot be said to be monopolists when any qualified bricklayer can join a union."

Illustrations of lawful combinations appear in the following cases:

U. S. v. E. C. Knight & Co., 60 Fed. 306; idem. 934.
Same case, 156 U. S. 1, 39 L. ed. 325;
Bigelow v. Calumet & Hecla Min. Co., 167 Fed. 727;
Anderson v. U. S., 171 U. S. 604, 43 L. ed. 300.

Every member of the United Mine Workers is engaged in the business of mining coal. His employment in or around a coal mine does not constitute an engagement in inter-state commerce. The mining of coal by him is not interstate commerce, and the fact that his employer, the operator, has engaged him to mine coal does not constitute inter-state commerce on the part of the operator. This is well settled by the authorities. He is simply producing an article that may ultimately become the subject of interstate commerce.

U. S. Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., 163 Fed. 701, 3 Fed. Anti-trust Dec. in the opinion at pages 420-422 of the latter report.
Hopkins v. U. S., 171 U. S. 578, 43 L. ed. 290.

But is not this now a moot question, since the Act of Congress of October 15, 1914, supplementary to and amendatory of existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies and for other purposes, which among other things provides,

"That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the anti-trust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the antitrust laws."

Fed. Stat., Anno., Pamphlet Supplement, No. 1, January, 1915, p. 121.

Under this law the respondents could not be enjoined from continuing their membership in this labor union, nor would a decree declaring it unlawful be effective to make it an illegal organization as against a valid Act of Congress.

The United Mine Workers of America had not prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit formed a conspiracy and by its officers or agents by inducements, threats, intimidation and coercion sought to compel petitioner's employes to join the said union, to cause them to leave its service, to cause petitioner's mine to be shut down, its plant to remain idle, its contracts to be broken and unfulfilled, until petitioner should unionize its mine against its own consent and surrender the management of its business to said labor union.

Under this heading question 5, 6 and 7, (ante pp. 39, 40) arising upon the record, as made by petitioner's bill, will be considered.

Before proceeding to a consideration of the evidence bearing on the matters here involved, as charged in the bill and denied by the answer, attention is called to the Difference between unionizing the men working in a mine and unionizing the mine itself.

In considering these questions, the attention of the Court is respectfully directed, as shown by the record, to the distinction existing between unionizing the men in and about a coal mine, and unionizing the mine at which these men are working. To unionize the men is simply to have them form themselves into a union by joining it and organizing themselves into a local, if they so desire. To unionize the mine, the men must not only be union men sufficient in number to deserve the name of being a unionized mine; but also the operator must enter into contractual relations with the United Mine Workers of America by signing the scale adopted by the organization, and the stipulations provided for in the scale. This is not only signed by the operator, but it is also signed by the representatives of the United Mine Workers of America.

As to this distinction the attention of the Court is called to those parts of the record appearing at pages 362, 422, 423, 499, 496, 500, 520. 521, 624, 625.

An examination of the testimony of the petitioner at page 362 shows some of the main features of the requirements necessary to unionize a mine; that is, to operate as a union mine. So, at page 422, in the evidence of the petitioner, the witness McKinley shows that the men might be unionized at a mine, and the mine owners not recognize the union; and the United Mine Workers could not recognize a mine, so as to have it operated union, without the consent of the operator; and this witness of petitioner says that the United Mine Workers will not work with non-union men. The same witness says that a mine, when unionized, is under contract to run union, and this contract provides a definite period when the scale of wages shall begin and when it shall end—usually a period of two years. (Record p. 423.)

At page 496 the witness Savage says:

> "There is a difference between unionizing a mine and unionizing the employes in the mine; unionizing the employes—is having the men join the organization; unionizing a mine is creating joint relations between the employers and employes; a mine cannot be unionized unless the employer enters into contractual relations with the union; it is not the policy or purpose of the United Mine Workers as an organization to coerce a man into doing a thing against his will; this distinction between unionizing a mine and unionizing the employes of a mine has existed since the organization came about, and this method of unionizing a mine existed in 1906 and 1907."

And this same witness says at page 500 that a mine cannot be unionized without an agreement signed up between the operator on the one side and the Mine Workers' organization as the representative of the men on the other side. Witness Lewis, at page 520 of the record, says:

> "When an agreement is made with an operator it is usually signed by the officers of the district and the representatives of the operator; or when it is a sub-district agreement that has terms that the district organization will not deal with because of their peculiar local character, the officers of the sub-district and the representatives of the operator sign that agreement; in addition to that they have what is known as a scale committee that has taken part in all the deliberations during the time that this contract was being negotiated; they are also called upon to sign this agreement. This shows the men at home that not only the officers have participated in the negotiations, but also the men direct from the mine."

This same witness says that the contract requires when the United Mine Workers engage to work for an operator, they are to see that the men live up to their agreement; the organization must see that the men report for work on time, and that they attend to their work and perform it carefully and faithfully in every respect. They contract to work eight hours a day when a mine is in operation, are expected to be there, and any employe who does not perform his work faithfully, can be dismissed, subject to an investigation. If he does not demand an investigation, nothing is done about it. It is the object of the organization to see that the members receive fair treatment, and that they also treat the operator fairly. (Record p. 521.) The witness Sullivan at page 624, also says:

> "The difference between organizing the men at the mine and organized the mine is that when the miners are organizing the work of organizing the mine is only just started. They next proceed to meet with the operator who owns the mine, or operates it, for the purpose of making contracts or agreements. Under the constitution and methods of the United Mine Workers a mine cannot be organized without the consent of the owner, and it is not the object or purpose of the United Mine Workers to do so, and never has been; it has never been attempted as far as witness knows.
> After a mine has been organized, the agreement between the employer and the organization is paramount. The constitution of the organization has nothing to do with the workings afterwards; that agreement does not take away from the operator the control of his men. The agreement is in writing and a copy of the one made in Ohio in 1910 is here handed to counsel for his inspection. If a member of the United Mine Workers in the territory comprised within District 6, should violate the agreement between the operator and the miners, the management of the mine has a right to discharge him; the discharged man could then have a hearing: it is taken up by the local officers at the mine, and if they fail to reach settlement it is referred up to the sub-district officers and very often they settle it. Perhaps it comes up to the state but not very often. The reason for these investigations as stated by the witness is that employers of labor as well as employes are very selfish, and are liable to make mistakes. The right of investigation is just as sacred to the employer as to the employe, for often the mine foreman or mine superintendent has some personal matter against one of his employes and he brings that into the mine and there he places inconveniences upon that employe to the extent that he can bear it no longer, and when he resists he is discharged. The mine owner knows nothing about this personal matter until he learns of it through the investigation. Then very often the mine foreman or superintendents are under the influence of liquor and say and do things that injure the business. When the mine owner finds out the true state of facts as a rule he puts the man back to work."

The difference between organizing the men and organizing the mine itself, is fully shown on the cross-examination of the witness Lewis at page 520, and at page 594 the method of organizing a non-union field is illustrated. The Court's attention is respectfully called to these two references.

The evidence shows here very conclusively the difference between unionizing the men and unionizing the mine. The former contemplates that men become members of the union, of course, of their own free will and accord; while the latter contemplates that the men belonging to the union are put into contract relations with their employer for a definite period under agreed stipulations entered into by the operator and representatives of the organization for that district and local. How can it be possible to unionize the mine of the petitioner without its consent? It has declared that it intends to run its mine nonunion, and it can continue to do so without any violence, threats, intimidation or coercion or other unlawful acts on the part of the United Mine Workers of America. An examination of the record discloses all the acts of the respondents to unionize the employes of the petitioner, that is, to get them to become members of the United Mine Workers, and every act is free from anything tending to show a resort to unlawful means for that purpose. The parts of the record bearing upon this matter appear at pages 286, 294, 305, 307, 311, 330, 332, 333, 337, 356, 358, 364, 365, 370, 374, 414, 415, 416, 428, 429, 436, 437, 440, 452, 458, 459, 466—471.

An examination of the record fails to disclose any evidence at all of acts on the part of the respondents or any of them to induce or attempt to induce any employees of the petitioners to quit its service, or to induce any person or persons who had agreed to enter its service not to do so.

It may as well now be stated, once for all, that the rec ord is wholly barren of any evidence of intimidation, coercion, threats or violence on the part of the respondents toward the employes of the petitioner.

We may also state at this point that the respondents Mitchell, Wilson, Hughes, White, Hayes, Perry, Moore, Albasin, Roy and Applegarth were never served with process to answer the bill in this case, and the last seven of the said respondents were not only not served with process, but were never made parties to the bill filed in this cause.

The parts of the record disclosing the presence about the petitioner's place of business of any of the respondents appear in the record at marginal pp. 345, 355, 365, 368, 369, 372, 373-377, 396, 398, 399, 404, 405, 406, 424, 425, 426, 433, 434, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 448, 453, 457, 505-516, 518-520, 532, 534, 535, 539-541, 548, 549-553.

We have thus specified all the pages of the record where anything whatever will be found connecting any of the respondents by their presence with any of the employees of the petitioner so as to converse or communicate with them in any manner at all, or to disclose on the part of the respondents any opportunity whatever to exert any influence upon the employees of the petitioner. We have done this for the convenience of the court and in fairness to counsel for the petitioner.

The parts of the record referred to as containing the evidence relating to the conduct of the respondents bearing on the question of the alleged conspiracy on their part, to induce the employees of the petitioner to quit its service or to prevent others from entering its service, in no manner whatever connects any of the respondents with this charge except Green, Watkins, Zelenka and Hughes. None of the other respondents are connected with this chargeby a mere scintilla of evidence.

The witness, Green, conducted his negotiations in the most orderly and gentlemanly way with petitioner's general superintendent, (record pp. 345, 355.) On page 534 of the record, the presence of Mr Green is noted in the neighborhood of the town of Benwood and at a point about one hundred feet from the Western Supply Co's store, but that he did nothing and went away on a street car, but the witness, speaking of this, did not hear him say anything to anybody. (Record pp. 534, 535.) The gentlemanly behaviour of Mr. Green may be further noted at p. 365.

As to the conduct of Mr. Hughes, one of the unserved respondents, the attention of the court is called to marginal pp. 368, 369, 372, 377, 396, 398, 404, 405, 424-426, 433, 434, 439-444, 448, 453, 457, 505-516, 518 520, 532, 531, 535, 539-541, 548 553.

An examination of the record at the pages here pointed out, clearly shows that the conduct of Mr. Hughes was free from all violence, coercion or intimidation. If the petitioner's witness, Pickett, is to be believed, Hughes seemed indifferent as to whether petitioners's employees became members of the United Mine Workers. It will be borne in mind that some of the employees of the Glendale

Coal Company were discharged because they joined the union, and the conversation betweeen Hughes, and petitioner's witness, Pickett, at page 369 of the record in the second paragraph of that page relates to the men of the Glendale Company, and not to the men of the Hitchman Company.

It nowhere appears that Hughes made any effort whatever to induce the men of the petitioner to quit its service, but it is insisted that he did prevent others from entering its service who had agreed to do so. It is contended that the record shows that some men were induced by Hughes not to enter the service of the petitioner from what appears in the record at page 404:

> "Q. Do you recall having employed any men for the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company at the time Thomas Hughes was about that mine?
> A. Yes, sir; I employed men during that time.
> Q. Do you recall whether any of the men you employed failed to report for work?
> A. Yes, sir; there were some of them failed.
> Q. Do you recall whether you saw Thomas Hughes in conversation with them at any time after your employment of the men and before the time they were to report for work?
> A. Yes, sir; I remember one time although I do not remember the date exactly, but I employed some men and they agreed to report for work later, and after leaving the mine they went out on the pike and I noticed them—or noticed Mr. Hughes talking to them—and those particular men never reported for work."

This is the only evidence even remotely connecting any of the respondents with the charge that they have conspired and combined together to induce persons who have agreed to enter the service of the petitioner not to do so; and we most respectfully submit that the evidence here quoted is wholly insufficient to support such a charge.

Upon cross-examination, this witness, Pickett, speaking with referance to the men with whom, in his examination in chief, he says he saw Hughes talking, states that there were three or four of these men, that they had not signed any contract of employment, that they said they wanted a job, said they were going after their tools. (Record pp. 406 407).

It will appear that the witness had never said anything to these men as to the conditions upon which they could be employed—that they could not be members of this labor organization would have to sign a written agreement not to become members of the United Mine Workers while working for the petitioner, and if they did so they would be required to quit at once.

From this statement of the evidence, can any reasonable man say that Hughes induced men who had agreed to enter the employment of the petitioner not to do so?

All that appears in the record in any manner connecting the respondent Watkins with the business of the petitioner since it began to run its mine non-union, appears in the record at pages 345, 355, 365. An examination of these references will show that Mr. Watkins did nothing whatever. There is not a scintilla of proof against this respondent with reference to this charge made in the bill.

The parts of the record connecting the respondent, Zelenka, with this charge in the bill appear at pages 345, 355, 365, 426, 433, 448, 534, 535.

None of these references show any evidence against the respondent, Zelenka, with reference to this charge (against the respondents) made in the bill.

There is no evidence at all in the record to sustain the allegation of a combination or conspiracy on the part of the respondents, to induce or compel the employees of the petitioner to quit its service or to induce others who had agreed to enter its service not to do so.

It was therefore error on the part of the learned District Court to perpetuate the injunction against the respondents on this charge of the bill.

At page 286 the respondents Green, Watkins and Zelenka introduce the subject of negotiations with the superintendent of the petitioner with a view of unionizing its mine, and the same thing appears at page 294. At pages 305-307 the unserved respondont Hughes has a conversation with one of the employes of the petitioner and further details of this conversation appear at pages 307-311. At page 330 a conversation with Hughes appears, held with one of the petitioner's employes, and also at pages 332-333. At page 334 mention is made of a notice of a meeting to be held at Nick Heil's baseball grounds, the nature of which is explained at pages 337-338, and it appears at page 342 that this baseball ground is a public place. At pages 350, 357, we find in the testimony of one of petitioner's witnesses the following:

"Q. In 1907 you resided where?
A. At McMechen.
Q. Did you have any meeting there at any time or under any circumstances with a man by the name of Thomas Hughes?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Well, state as nearly as you now recollect, how you came to meet him and what he had to say for himself?
A. Well, I heard a knock at the door one evening and I went to the door and there was a gentleman on the porch who introduced himself as Mr. Hughes, an organizer of the United Mine Workers, and he wanted to talk organization to me, I told him that I didn't care to talk organization at all. In the position I was in I told him that I didn't care to take any hand in it whatever. Mr. Hughes asked me if I owned my property. I told him I had bought it and was trying to pay for it; and he said if I became a member of the organization that they would get me a job at another place but it might not suit me as well as the one I had. He also advised me before he went away that I was right in not taking any hand in it.
Q. Did you see Mr. Hughes after that?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Well, under what circumstances?
A. He called a meeting one evening.
Q. Mr. Hughes called a meeting?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Of what?
A. Of the men at the Hitchman mine; and he made a speech.
Q. Were you there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Well, tell us as nearly as you now recollect, what he said?

A. He said quite a few things. He said that he had taken it up with the mayor of Benwood, and the mayor of Benwood had told him that there had been better men than 'Bill Daugherty' hung.

Q. Hughes said that in his speech and you heard him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, did you see Mr. Hughes after that speech?

A. Yes, sir.

* * * * *

Well, the next time I saw Hughes I told him that the Mayor and the chief of police both told me that if he came over there and bothered me any more to let them know; that he had wilfully lied about the statement he had made; and to let them know and they would lock him up.

Q. And what did Hughes say to that?

A. He just laughed.

Q. Now, in the speech that he made in which he made this remark about you, what was the general character of his remarks relative to the men and the mine?

A. Well, what I heard of it was, (I did not hear all of his speech) that the men had better organize; if they didn't the company would cut their wages and they would be compelled to take the reduction.

Q. Why would they be compelled to take it? Couldn't they work some place else?

A. He claimed not; that they did not belong to the United Mine Workers.

Q. Do I understand you to say, then, that he intimated to these men that unless they got into the union, that if they got out of work at the Hitchman they could not get any work at any union mine?

A. At any union mine; that was the understanding I had."

In speaking of this same meeting at Nick Heil's ball ground, another witness for the petitioner at page 370, says:

"Well, this Friday evening Hughes held a meeting in the ball park and witness went there, he saw a good many people there, they were miners mostly from Benwood and McMechen and when witness says from Benwood he means the Hitchman mine; witness does not know whether he could put in words the things that he recalls that Hughes said; witness says that Hughes said some very slandering things about some people in that neighborhood; he brought out some names that were connected with the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company; witness recalls that Hughes mentioned Daugherty's name, Jim Jarrett's name and Mr. Pickett's name; Mr. Pickett was superintendent of the Hitchman mine; in the course of his speech Hughes tried to make it appear that it was the right thing to join the union in Hughes' belief; he could not say whether Hughes made any comment upon the nerve of the men that were working at the Hitchman mine; Hughes did not comment upon the nerve of witness."

On cross examination this same witness says that by organizing the mine of the petitioner, he referred to the matter of getting the men to join the United Mine Workers; (record pp. 370, 371) and at pages 373, 374 this witness makes further explanation as to what he meant in his examination as to the remark made by the respondent Hughes. (Record pp. 414-416.)

The witness McKinley, testifying with reference to a conversation he had with the respondent Rankin, says:

"My recollection is that just after the Sub-District convention adjourned I met Mr. Rankin on the street and knowing him very well I entered into conversation with him. During that conversation I said to him, 'Well, what did you all do?' 'Well,' he said, 'there is one thing we did, and that was to arrange to organize the Panhandle district of West Virginia.' 'Well,' I said, 'why don't you let us alone?' and he replied, 'That was brought up in the convention and a resolution was passed directing us to organize the Panhandle;' and he said further, 'We will be over to see you right away,' or something to that effect.

* * * *

My recollection is that we did not hear anything about it for two or three months, and I thought they had given up the attempt until along about the middle of the summer they commenced to come in to see me, and mentioned the fact at different times when I saw them that they were going to organize us, and then afterwards I found that they were sending organizers about our mines, as well as other mines in the Panhandle District, and they told me what they were doing at other mines. They neglected to say, however, just what progress they were making at our own mine, except that they were going to get us sooner or later.

Q. And if they got the men and didn't get you, what would happen with your mine, did they say?

A. Oh, they said they would shut us down and compel us to recognize the union.

Q. Did they say anything on that line with reference to the other mines in the northern Panhandle District that were running non union?

A. Yes, sir, they stated specific mines that they were going to organize.

Q. What mines were they?

A. The Glendale, Hitchman, Richland—which was ours—and the Beech Bottom mine.

Q. Do you know from them what progress they made at the Glendale mine?

A. Yes, sir, they told me that they had twenty some men (I think it was twenty-four) who had joined the organization, and that they had sixty men who had signed up or had agreed to join the organization at Hitchman, and that they were going to shut the mine down as soon as they got a few more men.

Q. The Hitchman mine?

A. Yes, sir; and all of the mines in the Panhandle District would have to recognize the union or remain closed."

(Record pp. 414-416.)

On cross-examination of this witness he states that there is a difference between organizing the men at the mine and organizing the mine, and evidently the respondent Rankin in saying that it was the intention to organize the mine, only meant (and could mean nothing else) that it was the intention of the organization to get the employes of these mines to become members of the United Mine Workers of America. This they had a perfect right to do without the use of coercion, intimidation or violence.

At page 428 of the record another witness of petitioner says that he saw respondent Hughes on the property of the Richland Coal Company, and that the witness asked Hughes his business, and Hughes told him that he was there for the purpose of organizing the Panhandle District of West Virginia. And when further pressed by counsel for petitioner, this question was put to him: "What did you understand him to say was his meaning when he stated that he was there to organize the Panhandle District? A. Why, that he would make them join the United Mine Workers or tie them up were the words he used to me." This was a mere idle boast of this man Hughes, a man who has never been served with process, and who was wholly without power to do the very thing he said he would do. When further pressed by counsel for the petitioner for an explanation of the meaning of Hughes by the use of the expression referred to, this question was asked and answer given: "Did he make any explanation as to what he meant by tying up the Panhandle? A. That they would organize us and we would recognize the union. He went on further and stated that he would come down there and ask me for a job, and I would be compelled to give it to him, and he would work for me" (Record p. 430.) The witness further says: "My understanding of it was that if the company did not recognize this union that the mines would be shut down." This witness is the superintendent of the Richland mine, in the employ of the witness McKinley, who, as we have already seen, obtained an injunction for the purpose of preventing this organization from soliciting its men to become members of the United Mine Workers. The witness further says that Hughes said nothing about the Hitchman mine.

It will clearly appear from this evidence and the cross-examination of this witness at pages 433-435, that this man Hughes was merely "guying" this man Leonard, and Leonard knew it, and when coming upon the witness stand he endeavors to give it a very serious aspect in the interest of this very active witness McKinley, under whose employ Leonard is working at the Richland mine. It looks to us like a conspiracy on the part of these operators working together in this one case, to present some evidence at least, having an unlawful aspect, to perpetuate this very drastic and remarkable injunction.

At pages 436-437, of the record, reference is made by another witness of the petitioner to the notice of this meeting which was held at Nick Heil's baseball ground for the purpose of discussing the principles of organized labor.

At pages, 439, 440, another witness of petitioner, who tore down one of these notices, speaks of a conversation he had with Hughes, who had charged the witness with tearing down the notice and asked him why he took the notice down; and witness states that Hughes gave his name, and stated that he was a gentleman from the south, and that he was there for the purpose of organizing the Hitchman miners. That he had put the notice up and that he did not intend to be interfered with by such fellows as witness. Whereupon, witness says that he replied to Hughes as follows: "I told him I didn't know as I was interfering with his business; that I was not taking much interest in his business at all; and I can't recollect whether that was all or not; I may think of something else. Anyway he said he would settle with me later—that he would see me—and I replied to him that that was all right —he could do that; that he was on private property and to get out of the alley." And the witness says he did get out.

There were two of these notices and they were carefully taken to the office of the petitioner, and preserved by it, as if in an earnest endeavor to find something, somehow, and in some way, to make out a case for an injunction against these respondents. It serves to show the very strong antipathy of the persons connected with the Hitchman management existing against organized labor, and particularly against this organization.

The respondent Hughes, as a member of the United Mine Workers of America, had a perfect right under the law to give notice of a public meeting at a public place, such as Nick Heil's baseball grounds were and are, for the purpose of discussing the principles of organization. He was not doing so secretly, but openly; everybody was invited to attend the meeting. It was not to be conducted with closed doors for the purpose of making misrepresentations and offering threats of violence and injury to the employes of the petitioner or any one else.

At page 452 another witness of petitioner says that he met the respondent Hughes, and he asked witness if he would not sooner the Hitchman mine would be a union mine than the way it was run, and witness told him he didn't know whether he would or not. Then Hughes wanted to know if he would not go back in again, and witness told him that if he got the rest of the men he was willing, and the witness then states that Hughes remarked: "He said something about that he thought it would not be hard to get the balance of the men; and that was all I remember of his saying."

At pages 458, 459, another witness of the petitioner, says:

> "Q. Did you have any talk with a man by the name of Thomas Hughes?
> A. I remember him; yes, sir.
> Q. You remember a man by that name?
> A. Yes, sir.
> Q. What was he doing there—if he was about the Hitchman mine—if you recall?
> A. Well, he explained to me that he was trying to organize the place again.
> Q. What is that?
> A. To organize the Hitchman coal miners again.
> Q. What do you mean by organizing?
> A. To get us organized back into the United Mine Workers of America.
> Q. What did he say to you?
> A. Well, he said it would be a very nice thing if we would go back again; and so he said if I would put my name down and give him fifty cents on a book (he did not show me the book, but said it had lots of names down on it of the Hitchman coal miners); he said if I would give him fifty cents I would be entitled to a union card to go any place and get a job, if the Hitchman company would fire me, and he would put my name down on his book.
> Q. Did you give him the fifty cents?
> A. No, sir.
> Q. What did you say to him on that subject?
> A. Well, I said I would not do anything like this; he might be a stranger and I did not know that he was the man that he said he was, and anyhow, I was awful careful in putting my name down to anything. He told me that he was a good friend of Mr. Koch and that Mr. Koch had nothing against having the place organized again. He said he was a friend of his and I made the remark that I would ask Mr. Koch and see if it was so; and he said no; that was of no use, because he was telling me the truth.

Q. Did he show you any book?

A. No, sir; I was trying to see the names on the book but he would not show me anything. He told me he had it and I asked him how many names was on it, and he said he had about enough to 'crack off.'

Q. What is that?

A. That is what I didn't understand.

Q. Did you ask him what he meant by 'crack off?

A. The time was too short; no, sir. I was waiting for my street car to go home on and I went on the car.

Q. Did you say anything to Hughes about the job that you then had at the Hitchman mine?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, what did you say, if you can recollect?

A. Well, I told him that I didn't care much about being organized again, because I had too much experience already how it goes. I told him I was in several strikes and there wasn't anybody that helped me out, and I had to beg the company to get my job back again after I lost my job.

Q. Did you say anything to him about having any property?

A. Yes, sir; I told him it was impossible for me to go any place else, because I could not walk around with my property on my back and hunt another job. I says, 'I have work where I am now and as long as the company treats me as they are treating me I will not do anything against them that they didn't like to have."

On cross-examination this witness says that he and Hughes talked in a friendly way about the matter; that witness was waiting to go up on a street car when he had this talk, and this was the extent of it. (Record pp. 460, 461.)

At pages 466, 467, another witness for the petitioner, speaking with reference to Hughes, is examined as follows:

"Q. What did he talk to you about?

A. Oh, he tried to get me along with him to help him out so he could get the Hitchmau mine organized again.

Q. In what way did he ask you to help him?

A. To help him to get the people together, and everything, and he was to pay me for it.

Q. Were there at that time many men employed at the Hitchman mine who were foreigners?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you speak their language?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Could he speak their language?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did he want you to interpret—You understand what interpret means?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he want you to interpret what he said to those men?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you do it?

A. No; I would tell him I won't do it.

Q. Then what did he say?

A. He got mad and went away.

Q. After that did you see him any more?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did he treat you after that? I mean how did he treat you when you did not agree to interpret for him?

A. Why, he came to my house—the second time he came to my house.

Q. You mean he came to your house a second time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then he had been there before?

A. No; not before.

Q. The second time you talked to him he came to your house. Is that the idea?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, what did he say then?

A. He tried to get me to interpret again, and promised me a good job and everything else.

Q. Did that appeal to you then? Did you agree to do it then, or not?

A. No, sir; I would tell him I had nothing to do with him any more.

Q. Why did you tell him that?

A. They blamed me for not getting the men organized; they said it was my fault that the people kept on working.

Q. And that Hughes could not organize the mine?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did Hughes tell you that?
A. Yes, sir; he said that is what he heard off of the people.
Q. Did he tell you at any time how he was getting along?
A. No.
Q. Did he succeed in organizing the men there? Did he organize the men at the Hitchman mine?
A. No.
Q. Did the mine continue working while he was there?
A. Yes, sir."

Another witness for the petitioner makes a statement with reference to the respondent Hughes in his evidence appearing at pages 468-470, and we take from the record as to what this witness said, the following.

"Q. Were you about the Hitchman mine working there in the fall of 1907, when Thomas Hughes was there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see Thomas Hughes there?
A. Yes, sir; I saw him there several times.
Q. Did you have any talk with him?
A. Yes, sir; I talked with him several times.
Q. Did you hear him talk with any other persons?
A. He was around there all the time and he was talking to every one he would come to.
Q. To men employed at the Hitchman mine?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did he tell you what he was there for.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was it?
A He told me he was there to try to organize the mine.
Q. Did he say what his business was?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was it?
A. He said he was an organizer.
Q. For what?
A. For the United Mine Workers, and that he was there for that purpose. But I knew him before he came around there.

Q. You did know him before that?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did he say to you, if anything, with relation to organizing the mine?

A. I do not remember all that he did say, but I remember one certain thing that he said: He told me during one night that he was going to have a meeting called up there. I do not know what the date of it was, but it was in the latter part of August or first of September. He told me he had had a couple of meetings there, but he did not seem to think it was any good; but he told me he was forming a kind of secret order among the men. He said he had a few men—he did not state the number of them—and he said each man was supposed to give him so much dues to keep it going; and then he said after he got the majority he would organize the place. He asked me what I had to say about it and I told him my job at the present time was satisfactory and the men had agreed with the company not to organize and not to have anything to do with the organization, and I told him I did not want to have any trouble and nothing to say, anyway; and I think that was the last time I saw Hughes around there. I saw him after that across the river, but I didn't have any talk with him.

Q. Did he say anything to you about quitting work at the Hitchman and going to a union mine?

A. Yes, sir; he told me about it He said he would get me a job, and I told him that might be all right about that, but I told him I did not think he could place me in any job any better than the one I had at that present time; and that is about as far as that went.

Q. You say you remember of some meeting being held?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What kind of a notice did he put out for the meetings?

A. Well, I could not just say about the notices.

Q. Did he mark on the pavements, or anything of that kind?

A. Well, there was names around there, about meetings, but I do not know whether he wrote them, or who wrote them. I could not state just what was on them, but we miners claimed that that was what the purpose was.

Q. Were there calls for meetings marked on the pavements?

A. Yes, sir.

Q In chalk or some substance like that?

A. It was in chalk.

Q. White chalk?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that done anywhere near the Hitchman mine?

A. Well, the one I saw was right in front of Wilhelm's saloon, on the sidewalk.

Q. Where is Wilhelm's saloon with reference to the mine?

A. It was about 150 yards north of the mine.

Q. Did you attend any of the meetings that he held?

A. No.

Q. Did he say anything to you along the line of thought that unless you joined the union at that time, if the mine were unionized, you would not get a job.

A. Yes, sir; he stated to me that if we did not go in the local, or stay away from there and work where mines were organized, that we would not ever be able to get a job in a union mine, but I have worked in two union mines since that, and had two union cards, and then came back to the Hitchman.

Q. Did you hear him talk with others along the same line?

A. Yes, sir; he talked with them all about the same, that I ever heard him talk to.

Q. Did you hear him tell them that unless they joined then, that if the mine was organized they would be out of a job and they could not get any?

A. He was talking to me and there was five or six or seven sitting there in a bunch, and they all heard just the same as I did about it.

Q. Did he say what he was going to do with the men when he got enough to organize?

A. Yes, sir

Q. What did he say he was going to do?

A. He stated when he got a majority he was going to organize the mine. I expect the meaning of it was that he was going to organize whether it was against the company or not.

Q. Did he say anything about shutting the mine down it they did not unionize it?

A. He stated it that way—that whenever he got a majority he was going to organize or they would close the place down.

Q. In point of fact, did he get a majority and unionize the mine or not?
A. No, sir; I think he failed."

On cross-examination, this witness, in further explanation of his conversation with Hughes, says:

"Q. Well, then, while he was there he was trying to get men to join the union?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And he invited you to join the union?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And told you he thought it would be better for you to join, didn't he?
A. Yes, sir; that is what he said.
Q. And he said if you worked there and happened to be discharged, you could not get into a union mine?
A. That is what he said.
Q. His idea was that there were a great many more union mines across over in Ohio than there were non-union, wasn't it?
A. I expect that was what he meant.
Q. Well, did he give you any further reasons why he thought it would be better for you to join the union?
A. No; not just exactly."

(Record p. 471.)

This is the sum and substance of the evidence introduced by the petitioner that the respondents had formed a conspiracy prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit, to compel the petitioner to organize its mine without its consent, and to shut down its mine until it would surrender the management of its business to the control and direction of the United Mine Workers of America. What was said by the respondent Zelenka appearing in the record at pages 286, 358, 364, simply amounts to a gentlemanly and orderly conversation, merely expressive of his desire to one or two of the men, and to the superintendent, to have the men return to the organization and the mine placed on a union basis. In fact, his conduct was merely of a passive nature, scarcely manifesting an interest in the subject of organization. It is a remarkable thing that out of the hundreds of men in the employ of the petitioner it was only able to produce a very few of them that even had conversations with the respondents, and these conversations related almost entirely to the respondent Hughes.

It is true that the respondent Hughes was a representative of the organization, but he was simply authorized, as will be shown presently by the evidence, to use argument and persuasion with the employes of the petitioner to become members of the United Mine Workers, and if he went farther than this he did so without warrant or authority for it from the organization, and not in the promotion of the interests of the organization. The uncontradicted evidence of the witness Savage makes this so clear that it cannot admit of question. In the first place, this witness says that had the organization sought to organize the employes of the Hitchman mine, they would not have sought to have them cease working for the company, because as an organization they do not desire to go to a mine and get a lot of idle men on their hands. It some times occurs that they do have them, but if the men quit of their own accord the organization is not responsible for it; that witness knows nothing of any movement, either as an individual or as an officer, in any way, to have the men of the Hitchman Company cease working for it, in 1906 or 1907, or at any other time since it started up non-union; he had nothing to do with it individually and knows of no attempt of that kind on the part of the United Mine Workers. (Record p. 498.)

The witness further says that he is acquainted with Thomas Hughes; he was employed by District 6 as an organizer in 1907; but he had no power or authority to shut down the Hitchman mine; no organizer has such power; the business of an organizer is to try to induce men to join the union; the witness further says it is not the policy of the union to coerce men into joining the union; they are expected to join voluntarily and freely. (Record p. 490.) Then witness further says that the United Mine Workers did not in 1907, nor have they since then, tried to compel the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, without its consent, to recognize the United Mine Workers in its contractual relations with its men; that it was not then and is not now the policy of the United Mine Workers to dictate to the Hitchman Company the men it should employ; and that an operator who is running his mine as a unionized mine has a right to discharge men for cause. (Record p. 500.)

The only evidence in the case that can be construed into anything like unlawfulness is the idle declaration and boast of the respondent Hughes, as testified to by a few of the witnesses, with reference to what he would do when the mine was organized, and the employes of the petitioner themselves, who had formerly been union men, knew as well as Hughes himself knew, that he could not organize the mine itself, although every one of the men in its employ might become members of the union. They also knew as well as he did that he had no power or authority to shut the mine down. It is clear from the record that if the men of the petitioner had been organized into the union they could not go out on a strike without a grievance and upon their own motion. The policy of the organization is not to permit a strike except to redress a grievance on the part of the men working. If this grievance can be redressed by conciliation or arbitration under the rules of the organization, this course must be pursued. A strike is the last resort permitted for the redress of a grievance. This strike cannot take place even then until the representative officers of the organization having the matter in charge have failed in the negotiations with the operator to effect a redress. Even then the men are not at liberty to quit the service of the operator as union and organized men, and as a part of the United Mine Workers' organization, unless this strike is directed by the proper officers. This is the common sense and fair view of the matter, not only from the standpoint of the employer, but from that of the organization and the miner himself; because when the men are out of employment, as they are out of employment when on a strike, the rules of the organization require that they shall be supported at the cost of the organization; and the cost to the organization to support men out of employment while on a strike has been very considerable.

And therefore if for no other reason, the policy of the organization is not to encourage strikes or "shut downs" as they are called. In fact, it is in evidence that the president of this organization at the time this testimony was taken, personally does not favor strikes. He shows that it was his ambition at that time, as an officer of the organization, to bring about a situation that might ultimately remove the necessity for a strike under any circumstances.

The learned Circuit Court of Appeals that decided this cause goes into detail in its examination of this phase of the case (Record pp. 214 Fed. at pp. 708-712), and finds from the evidence there was no combination or conspiracy to do the wrongful acts imputed to respondents as charged in petitioner's bill, as summarized in italics in the headline of this part of our brief.

If this Honorable Court should conclude to go into the merits of this case, upon a writ of certiorari, it will determine all questions arising upon the record according to fixed rules of law.

> American Construction Co. v. Jacksonville T. & K. W. R. Co., 148 U. S. 372-378, 37 Law. ed. 486, 492, in the opinion, citing Harris v. Barber, 129 U. S. 366, 369, 32 Law. ed. 697, 699.

The principle here enunciated by this court restricts the petitioner on a writ of certiorari to the case as made by it in the District Court upon the pleadings filed therein and the evidence properly brought into the record bearing on the issues in the cause.

Documentary Evidence as to Unionizing Petitioner's Mine Without its Consent.

In a further endeavor to show that the respondents prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit were in a conspiracy to unionize the mine of the petitioner without its consent and against its will, the petitioner by its learned counsel introduced in evidence in this cause the bill of complaint against these respondents in another suit brought against them by the Richland Coal Company, and also the bill in a certain other suit brought against them by the Glendale Coal Company.

An examination of these bills will show them to be practically identical with the bill in this cause; that the verification of them was made October 23, 1907—the same day upon which the bill in this case was verified; that the bill in the case of the Richland Coal Company was sworn to by J. C. McKinley, who became a very important witness in this case in support of some of the material allegations of the bill filed therein.

The introduction of the bills of complaint in the cases just named as evidence in this case, was under objection, and is made the subject of respondents' exception, XXIV, (record p. 228) and XXXIV. (Record p. 230)

The allegations of these bills amount to nothing more than affidavits, and constitute no more than sworn declarations of the presidents of these companies, both of whom are stockholders, and one of them, McKinley, the general manager and a majority stockholder in the Rich land Company. These bills are mere self serving declarations dignified by the sanctity of an oath. A bill is a mere statement by the plaintiff of the essential facts of his case, and when made by an officer of a corporation, it is only a statement of these facts by such officer, and when sworn to by the officer, it is but the affidavit of that officer.

> "Affidavits are not formal proof, and hence they are not generally admissible as evidence at the final hearing on the issues made by the pleadings. Their use is confined to the interlocutory stages of the suit, and their chief purpose is to satisfy the court, as to the propriety and validity of various interlocutory orders or steps."
> 2 Street, Fed. Eq. §1300.

Here these bills only amount to self serving declarations, and are therefore incompetent as evidence in support of the issues arising from the denial of the allegations of the bill by the answers of the respondents.

> "It is a general rule of broad application that the declarations of a party in his own favor are not admissble in his behalf."
> Jones on Evidence (2nd ed.) §235.

The allegations in the bills of complaint in the other two cases, sworn to ex parte, are mere hearsay so far as this case is concerned and are therefore incompetent.

> "The inherent weakness of hearsay testimony is not cured by the fact that the statement has been made under oath, or in any judicial proceedings between other parties. Thus, a voluntary affidavit ranks in equal grade with other hearsay testimony in the law of evidence."
> Jones on Evidence, (2nd ed.) §299.

An examination of these two bills will show that they are substantial copies of the bill in this case, prepared by the same counsel, and evidently in consultation with the two presidents, McKinley of the Richland Company and Hitchman of the Glendale and Hitchman Companies. It seems to be a far-fetched effort to perpetuate the injunction in this case against everybody in any wise connected with the United Mine Workers of America, including its national, district and sub-district organizations in every state in the union

An examination of the testimony discloses that Rankin, through whose idle and boastful declarations as to what he would do—because nobody is mentioned with him—(McKinley mentions nobody connected with him although effort was made to have him do so), all of the respondents, members and officers of this organization are sought to be made guilty of a conspiracy to unionize the petitioner's mine without its consent. And this same man Rankin about whom McKinley' testifies—it was only on one occasion that he made any of his boasts, and it was to McKinley alone— has become the manager of a coal company himself in Ohio, and under the policy of the United Mine Workers, as testiffed to by the witness Lewis, he cannot be the manager of a coal company, or its foreman or its superintendent, and be connected with the United Mine Workers of America

Furthermore, it is sought to perpetuate this injunction on a few isolated declarations and acts of Hughes unwarranted and unauthorized by any action by the officers of the organization, against the entire organization—international, national, district and sub-district, and all of these officers disclaim any authority or power upon the part of Hughes to unionize the petitioner's mine without its consent, or to use anything but reason and persuasion to induce its men to become members of the United Mine Workers; and that, too, when Hughes has never been served with process and is beyond the jurisdiction of the court. It is sought to affect the entire status of this organization on this class of testimony, and to absolutely prevent its doing anything whatever to promote the growth of its organization, no matter how peaceful the methods used for that purpose.

The Declaration of Hughes and Rankin.

The declarations of Hughes and Rankin cannot be used against the organization, its officers and members, until it is first shown that these officers and members, as representatives of the organization, or at least among themselves individually, have formed a conspiracy to unionize the mine of the petitioner against its consent. If they have attempted this, whether members of the organization or not, and even separate and apart from the organization, they are guilty of a tort, and would be amenable to the injunctive process of the court without reference to their relationship to this labor union.

Therefore the first condition to be met in order to use the declarations of Hughes and Rankin in this case, is to prove first that the United Mine Workers of America, its representatives and members, have formed a conspiracy to unionize the petitioner's mine against its consent, and to do this unlawful means must be employed; or second, if there is no proof of this, then there must be further proof that the respondents individually are in a conspiracy or have formed a conspiracy to unionize the mine of the petitioner against its consent.

If this be shown and it be further shown that Hughes and Rankin constituted a part of this conspiracy, then their declarations as co-conspirators are admissible against the respondents.

A recent standard work, discussing the admissibility of the acts and declaration of conspirators in furtherance of the conspiracy, continuing with the subject, says:

"Involved in all of the cases cited in support of the preceding sections is the essential element of the fact that a conspiracy had been formed; and accordingly it is necessary in all cases that there be proof of conspiracy, otherwise evidence of the acts and declarations of one member is inadmissible against the other parties to the conspiracy, although it may be received against the party who made them, provided, of course, it comes within rules discussed elsewhere in this work as to the admission of declarations against the declarant"

3 Enc. Ev. 424, 425.

It will not be inferred simply because the respondents were members and officers of the national, district and sub district organizations, that from the fact of this membership they were in a conspiracy to organize, without its consent and against its will, the mining plant of the petitioner. As we shall see hereafter, a labor organization does not constitute a conspiracy; as already shown, it is a lawful organization. We discuss the subject of conspiracy as relating to labor organizations in another part of this brief.

Another part of the documentary evidence of the petitioner is referred to in the bill of petitioner. (Record p. 20.) This documentary evidence consists of two resolutions, one designated as "Number 8" and the other as "Number 10". These resolutions were adopted at a convention of Sub-District 5 held at Wheeling in March, 1907. Only one of these resolutions applies or can apply to this case, and this is Resolution Number 8, which reads as follows:

"Whereas, there are miners in the Pan-Handle District and Ohio that are not organized, and believing every mine should be organized, be it Resolved, by this Ninth Annual Convention that the Sub-District officers together with the District officers, be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the Sub-District as quickly as it can be done."

An examination of this resolution discloses that it contemplated an effort on the part of the sub-district together with the district officers, to take up the work of organizing every mine in the sub-district as quickly as may be done. As we have seen, the organizing of a mine contemplates the entry into contract relations between the organization and the operator. That is, that the mine of the operator be under contract with its employes made jointly between it and the representatives of the organization acting for the men working in the mine.

It cannot be inferred from this resolution that the officers had in mind unlawful methods of securing the unionizing of the petitioner's mine. As said by the Circuit Court of Appeals in Lawler v. Loewe, 187 Fed. 522, decided after a decision in the same case rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States, (208 U. S. 274,) in discussing a clause of the constitution of the United Hatters' Association which provided that certain of its officers "shall use all the means in their power to bring such shops (i. e., non-union shops) into trade," this does not necessarily imply that these officers shall use other than lawful means to accomplish such object. So, in this case, this resolution spoken of, to unionize the mines in that sub-district, only contemplates lawful means.

This statement of the law that it will not be presumed that the members of a labor organization will carry out the purposes, lawful in themselves, of their association, in an inlawful manner, is illustrated in numerous cases found in the books.

In Sheffield v. Balmer, 52 Mo. 474, 14 Am. Rep. 430, the syllabus of the case is as follows:

> "Plaintiffs contracted to publish an advertisement in the weekly (Sunday) edition of their paper for a year. Held, that as it did not appear, and was not to be presumed, that the contract contemplated any labor to be done on Sunday, it must be held to be valid."

In Missouri there was a statute forbidding any labor on Sunday, fixing a fine for its violation. In this case the contract was as follows:

> "St. Louis, November 24th, 1868.
> We agree to pay Sheffield, Easton & Stone, publishers St. Louis Home Journal, five dollars per issue for publishing a one hundred (1 3 column) line advertisement for us in their weekly (Sunday) edition every Sunday for one year; said advertisement to be changed at our option.

BALMER & WEBER."

In the course of the opinion, the court says:

> "The contract sued on does not require the plaintiffs, either expressly or by any necessary inference, to violate this statute. It is not required that an hour's work shall be performed on Sunday. The advertisement is required to be published in the weekly (Sunday) edition of the paper every Sunday. Now this may all be done, and the contract be completely performed, without violating the law by performing labor on Sunday in the least degree, and if the contract can be performed without any violation of law, then it is only a natural and legal presumption that it will be so performed, or at least there is no legal presumption that it will not be so performed."

14 Am. Rep. at page 433.

The law intends that when a thing may be done lawfully, that the party or parties undertaking to do the thing will do it lawfully.

> Skiff v. Stoddard, 63 Conn. 108, 26 Atl. 974, 28 Atl. 104, 21 L. R. A. 102.

As to Resolution Number 10, it is sufficient to say that it does not apply to the petitioner, because it is running non-union, over which the organization has no jurisdiction; the very wording of the resolution shows that it applies to union mines only.

Another question brought into this case at the final hearing by the introduction of the petitioner's testimony and which is sought to be supported by documentary evidence, is whether or not the respondents prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit, were in a conspiracy or combination with the coal operators of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Western Pennsylvania, to unionize the petitioner's mine without its consent and against its declared policy and intention to run its mine on a non-union basis.

There is no allegation of such combination or conspiracy contained in the bill, and, of course, the respondents had no opportunity on the final hearing to meet such a charge not contained in the pleadings.

The only course, therefore, open to respondents at the final hearing when this character of evidence was introduced, was to submit their objections to it in the form of exceptions, all of which appear in the record, and are specifically pointed out in this brief at pages 186-188. So far as the printed record in any manner bears on this feature of the case, it will be found therein at pages 291-294, 388, 396, 411-413, 479, 479, 479, 484, 485, 502, 506, 533, 540-545, 570, 575-584, 592, 609-615, 619, 642.

Before calling the Court's attention to the contents of the record to which reference by pages here is made, it will be seen that the petitioner introduced certain documentary evidence, on the phase of the case to which we now call the Court's attention. This consists of the following:

"Proceedings of Joint Conference of Coal operators and Coal Miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, Cincinnati, Ohio, March 8-29, 1910," known in the record of the case as McKinley's Exhibit No. 4, and as Upstill's Exhibit No 1, and which was excepted to as incompetent and irrelevant for the reasons assigned in the record as exceptions LXVII (record p. 237) and LIII. (Record p. 234.)

Also book entitled "Proceedings of the Eighteenth Annual Convention of the United Mine Workers of America: Held in the City of Indianapolis, Ind , January Fifteenth to Twenty second inclusive, 1907," and known in the record of this case as Plaintiff's Documentary Exhibit No. 4, and which is made the subject of respondents' exception XXI. (Record p. 227.)

Also a book entitled "Proceedings of the Ninth Annual Convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6, United Mine Workers Of America, Held at Wheeling, W. Va., March 14, 15, 16, 18 and 19, 1907," and known in the record as Plaintiff's Documentary Exhibit No 5, and is made the subject of respondents' exception XXII. (Record p. 228)

Also a book entitled "Official Mining Scale of Association of Pittsburg Vein Operators of Ohio for their Mines in Belmont, Harrison and Jefferson Counties, Ohio, and United Mine Workers of America. In effect April 1st, 1906, and ending March 31, 1908," and known in this record as McKinley's Exhibit No. 8, and made the subject of respondents' exception LVII. (Record p. 235.)

Also book entitled "United Mine Workers of America, District No. 6, Ohio, Issued by the Authority of the Executive Board of District No. 6, (Ohio Members) United Mine Workers of America, G. W. Savage, Secretary-Treasurer. For scale year April 1, 1908 to March 31, 1910," and known in the record of this case as Koch's Exhibit No. 1, and made the subject of respondents' exception. (Decree, record p. 696.)

Also a book entitled "Detailed Mining Scale for Subdistrict 5 of District 6, U. M. W. of A. Effective from April 1, 1910, to March 31, 1912," and known in the record of this case as McKinley's Exhibit No. 9, and made the subject of respondents' exception LXIII. (Record p. 236)

Also "Excerpts from President T. L. Lewis' Report to the Twentieth Annual Convention of the United Mine Workers of America, held at Indianapolis, Indiana, in January, 1911, as published in the United Mine Workers Journal in its issue of January, 19, 1911," and known in the record of this case as Lewis' Exhibit No. 1, and made the subject of respondents' exception LXIX. (Record p. 238.)

Also "Expenditures of the United Mine Workers of America for the year 1910," as published in the Mine Workers' Journal in its issue of January 26, 1911, and known in the record of this cause as Lewis' Exhibit No. 2, and made the subject of respondents exception LXX. (Record p. 238.)

Also "Income of the United Mine Workers for year 1910," as published in its Journal of January 26, 1911, and known in the record of this cause as Lewis' Exhibit No. 3, and made the subject of respondents, exception LXXI (Record p. 238.)

Also the "Annual Report of the International Auditors, showing Income and Expenditures for the year, 1910," as published in the United Mine Workers' Journal in its issue of January 26, 1911, and known in the record of this cause as Lewis' Exhibit No. 4, and made the subject of respondants' exception LXXII. (Record pp. 238, 239.)

Before calling the Court's attention to these exhibits, let us briefly notice what appears in the printed record.

At pages 290-293 the witness McKinley identifies the exhibits therein mentioned, but on cross-examination he is unable to authenticate them as being copies of the originals. On page 385 the witness identifies McKinley Exhibit No. 9. At page 396 of the record the witness says that the scale of wages fixed by the union is done in convention, and afterwards the representatives of the union meet the operators in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois for the purpose of agreeing upon a scale, and to determine whether or not the price demanded by the organization for the miners can be accepted by the operators. At pages 411-413 of the record the witness McKinley shows how the scale of wages is applied to the general mining conditions in certain union fields, and certain non union fields. The witness also refers to a statement made by the defendant Lewis in a joint conference of coal operators and coal miners of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana, appearing in McKinley's Exhibit No. 4, and Upstill's Exhibit No. 1, from which this quotation is made: "If I have a proper conception of this movement, it does not mean that either miners or operators can publicly say 'We will organize West Virginia in order that the miners of Ohio or Indiana can get more work', that has done more to prevent the organization of West Virginia than anything I know of." The witness then says in answer to a question that this compares with the attitude of the United Mine Workers, and that he has heard practically the same language used himself. At pages 412, 413, quotations are made from Upstill's Exhibit No. 1, as to certain statements attributed to Mr. Savage, in which this language occurs:

> "Operators have told me in years past that they were willing to have the miners organize in Ohio, but they were not willing that their miners should be organized in West Virginia. We find as great opposition on the part of the operators from this State who have mines in West Virginia as we find from the operators resident there. If we are going to work along the line of mutual benefit, let us make West Virginia a union State. Go down there and practice what you preach in Ohio. Help us get protection of the law in that State and I think we can organize the miners. Instead of helping us, what have you done? You have done nothing but retard the progress of our organization in that State. The reason they have assigned to me for their attitude was that the calibre of the men employed in the mines of West Virginia was such that if they were organized it would be impossible to control them. I believe that a large percentage of these men are as intelligent as we are, and once they understand the benefits of the organization and the benefits of the contract we enter into, they will observe those contracts as religiously as the miners in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana, or any other State."

At page 478 the witness Upstill says that in the territory of Belmont, Jefferson and Harrison Counties, in Ohio, where union labor is employed, and in the Pittsburgh Vein No. 8 at the Hitchman mine, where non-union labor is employed, operating conditions are substantially the same, and the cost of production is about the same. At page 479, the witness Upstill states that the coal from the northern Panhandle of West Virginia is shipped to the west; and that there is a further differential of twenty-five cents per ton in favor of Ohio coal as against the Panhandle coal.

At page 485 the witness speaks of not being able to fill the orders of the Hitchman Company for the lake trade in 1907, and he got coal on the Ohio side of the river for that purpose.

At page 484, on cross-examination, the witness Savage says that he made the statement attributed to him on pages 112 and 113 of Upstill's Exhibit No 1, and gives the reason therefor. The witness says that when an effort is made in Ohio among the operators to obtain an increase in wages, they cite the West Virginia field in opposition to it; and the witness then says: "We (referring to the United Mine Workers) believe that if we organize West Virginia that that would take away the argument that they present to us in Ohio and the competitive fields, and we ask their assistance in organizing this State." Witness recalls certain statements made by Mr. Chapman, contained in Upstill's Exhibit No 1, at pages 64, 65, and says that he heard similar remarks made at various conventions, but that the organization does not agree with these statements. At page 506 the witness Savage, upon re-direct examination says.

> "It was not, in 1907, or at any time before or since, the purpose of the organization of the United Mine Workers of America to form locals and get miners to join the union for the purpose of discriminating against the West Virginia operator and in favor of the Ohio operator; if efforts were made in 1907 to get the employes of the Hitchman Company to become members of the Union, it was not for the purpose of discriminating against that Company in favor of any other operator; it is the purpose to organize all the workers in the country, and if they were to do that they would never hope of organizing the miners anywhere. The Mr. Chapman to whose remarks attention was called on cross-examination was a coal operator."

At page 533 the witness Lewis says that "There is no foundation in fact for the statement made by the witness McKinley that it is the purpose of the United Mine Workers and those who meet with them in convention, to so place the West Virginia non-union operators that their coal cannot come in competition with the same markets they now compete in the West and northwest; that the miners' organization is not attempting to do that by organizing the miners of West Virginia."

The witness, continuing, says:

"In conventions the operators of the central conpetitive field, including Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, have always urged against improving the condition of the miners and against advancing the wages of the mine workers from the standpoint of their inability to do so, and earn a profit on their iuvestments, taking into consideration the cost of producing coal When that argument is met by the miners and they find that they are not able to defend their position, they then always bring up as a bugaboo the argument of coal being shipped from West Virginia, and that if they advance the wages of the men and add any more to the cost of production, it will simply drive the trade to West Virginia; and incidental to that, they say that we should organize the miners of West Virginia in order that their trade will not be taken away from them. The reply of the miners is that if West Virginia is organized, they are as much entitled to their share of the general and northwestern markets as operators in Ohio and Western Pennsylvania or anywhere else. Consequently there can be no foundation for any such statement.

All the coal from the Kanawha district is shipped either into the northern northwest or the southern northwest. Part of it goes by the Kanawha river to the southern market. There isn't any coal from the Kanawha district that goes east; it goes west in competition with the coal produced in Western Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana; the Kanawha district is operated union under a contract agreed upon between the operators and miners in that district."

At page 545 the witness Lewis shows how the joint movement between the operators of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and the United Mine Workers came about, and as shown, it was for the sole purpose of bettering the condition of the Mine Workers, and indirectly, the operators themselves. At page 542 the States taking part in this conference are mentioned, and at page 584, in answer to a question propounded to the witness by the court, the theory and purpose of these joint conferences are stated.

"The Court: Q. Do I understand you, Mr. Lewis, that you combine the states and hold these joint conventions, where that can be done, and make one contract, and if that is not convenient—you hold conventions between the district organizations and the operators in local fields?

A. Yes, sir; your Honor, that is the purpose and idea. In order to make it probably a little more clear we will take the states of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Western Pennsylvania and a part of West Virginia. They find markets for their coal in the northwest and outside of what they sell for fuel purposes in a domestic way. Then in the southwest those states are competitive with each other and more so than they would be with the states in the central competitive field. The states in the Rocky Mountain region are competitive with each other and more so than they would be with Kansas or Oklahoma, or Ohio, Illinois, West Virginia, and Western Pennsylvania.

Q. You make a different contract in different sections?

A. That is the purpose of the movement. For instance, if we had a Maryland organization, and what is known as the Myersdale section of Pennsylvania, and central Pennsylvania, and in the Irwin field along with eastern West Virginia, we would have those operators and miners get together because their markets are on the eastern seaboard. Their markets are competitive and they would have a joint movement. Then, again, the southern states would have a joint movement —Tennessee, Alabama and Kentucky * * if they were organized."

Let us notice here, then, the effect of these joint conferences between the United Mine Workers and the operators of the different competitive fields. Take, for illustration, the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and West Virginia, and the western part of Pennsylvania. These states compete for the lake trade where a large tonnage of coal finds a market, and these states all, of course, must compete in this market for the sale of their coal product The cost of production is the controlling factor, in connection with that of transportation, in the matter of competition. Now, if the cost of production can be equalized among these various states, so far as physical conditions will permit, then the operators of every one of these states is in a better position to compete with the others than if this equality in the cost of mining did not exist. For illustration, if in one state wages are much higher than in another state, with conditions practically the same, the operators of the state in which the higher wages are paid could not advantageously compete with the operators in another state, in which the cost of mining or the wages paid the miner were less.

Now, in national convention the only thing that the representatives of the organization have to do with wages, is to determine whether the scale that then exists in the various districts shall be raised or lowered, and these various scales so existing are taken as the basis upon which an increase of the scale is made. If the convention determines upon an increase, they fix the amount of the increase, and the base scale in any particular district is thus affected by the increase.

This increase or decrease is made by a percentage, the base scale existing in any district being taken as the unit for the increase percentage In support of this statement the Court is referred to the record at page 543, where it will apper that the counsel for the petitioner asked the purpose of this interstate convention system, to which the witness Lewis answered as follows:

"A. To arrange a wage agreement to govern > mining rates the day-wage scale and the conditions of employment; and the reason that there have been no efforts made to have one national joint convention was on account of the diversified conditions in the different mining states due to the different character of the veins of coal; and it would be a physical impossibility to work out all the details of wage agreements in a national joint convention. Eventually, if they establish it, they would have to deal with the national organization and still refer back for district or sub-district agreement, all details of any wage contract that might become effective."

Then further on the witness is interrogated by the counsel for the petitioner as follows:

> "Q. And was it contemplated that these joint conventions when agreed upon should themselves constitute another higher or lower body?
>
> A. No; the object was to try to establish—as near as the natural conditions of the veins would permit—uniformity within the district as between the mining districts.
>
> Q. What was taken as generally the base of the wage scale—the scale of wages—that might be agreed upon between the operators of the central competitive states and the United Mine Workers in their joint conventions?
> A. The basis of negotiating and agreeing upon contracts was taken from the physical condition of the mines, the selling price of the coal and the earning power of the mine. Those are the three elements that enter into the negotiations of wage contracts." (Record p. 543.)

This clearly shows that the whole purpose of these joint conferences was to equalize the wage contracts of the mine workers so as to remove the inequalities existing in the same mining district among different operators in any particular competitive field, whether composed of one or more states, and in this way enable the operators to compete with each other in finding a market for their coal. It is perhaps needless to say that by this organization, as shown clearly and undisputably by the evidence, the wage earner in the coal mines of this country is receiving a far better price for his labor than he would be receiving if this organization had not been formed.

It is not the object of the United Mine Workers of America to unionize West Virginia for the purpose of making a wage rate by means of the union so high that the West Virginia operator could not compete with the operator either in Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana or Illinois. If that were the purpose it would destroy the coal industry of West Virginia, and the union itself would have to find employment for 78,000 or more miners now engaged in the coal field of West Virginia. And the organization would thus bring upon itself an overwhelming calamity by throwing these 78,000 or more men into the union fields, who would themselves be competing with the members of the United Mine Workers for employment in the fields that are already unionized. If these 78,000 men should go into the union fields, they of course, would join the United Mine Workers, and thus they could not find employment all the time in Ohio, and the time of work would have to be divided with these employes from West Virginia The very statement of this proposition is a refutation of the contention that the purpose of organizing West Virginia is to keep the operators from competing with those in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and western Pennsylvania.

If the United Mine Workers of America were permitted to organize in the whole state of West Virginia, there would be a base w ge rate for the Kanawha field in one end of the state, and also a base wage rate for the field, in the Fairmont region, and in fixing the basis of each of these sections, the operators and miners in conference would take into consideration the physical condition of the mines, the selling price of the coal, and the earning power of the mines. Everything would be considered in order to equalize the cost to the operator with reference to the cost in any other field competitive with the West Virginia fields. For illustration, the operators in the Kanawha field would be competing with the operators selling their coal in the Northwest, and the Fairmont field in selling their coal in the East, and so on

We now submit this question: If the purpose of these joint conferences is to equalize the cost of mining to all the operators in any competitive field, the conditions with reference to each field being considered and treated as the prime factor in determining the cost of mining, would all the different operators in this competitive field be better enabled to compete in the market for the sale of the coal? If they would not be in a better situation to compete for the market, why not? If operators could not compete with each other under those conditions, then some other factor must interpose to prevent competition.

Now, turning to page 570 of the record, the witness says:

> "When we have an organized mine that means that all the men in that mine are governed by the contract under which that mine is operated, and the men are paid their wages and governed by the laws of the organization. The operators understand what our laws are when they make contracts with our people."

The witness further says that when he uses the word "operators" he does not mean only those who take part in the joint conferences, but all mine owners whether in the conference or not. And to give the operator who is in contract relations with the United Mine Workers a free hand in the management of his mine, the witness says at page 571, that a mine superintendent or mine foreman cannot retain his membership in the organization, any more than a mine worker can be a member of the operators' association. The reason for this is that the interests of the members of the operators' association and the interests of this labor organization are opposed. The conflict between labor on the one side and capital on the other is fundamental. The one contending, of course for the highest wage rate, and the other for the lowest.

At pages 582-584 appears a wage agreement for the Hocking District with an explanation of it given by the witness Lewis. At page 592 the attention of the witness is called to a statement made by him in the Eighteenth Annual Convention of the United Mine Workers, held in Indianapolis in January, 1907, to which the witness replies that these statements are true, and further, that he is opposed to placing an embargo upon the development of the resources of any coal producing state in the interest of other states, and this cannot be done if every operator is given an equal opportunity to enter the general market.

At pages 609-615 the witness is interrogated as to the contents of McKinley's Exhibit No. 2, and McKinley's Exhibit No. 1, and the witness is then asked the following question, (record p. 612;) "Was it not also said during that Cincinnati Convention held in 1910, by yourself, that in order to fulfill the pledge of the Chicago Convention (held in 1898) that the United Mine Workers were willing to go ahead and unionize West Virginia, but you wanted the operators to assist?" To which the witness answered as follows:

> "I may have said that in Cincinnati. I believe in fact, that I have said it in more than one convention, and in doing that I have always insisted upon the operators of those fields doing what they could to bring about conferences between the operators of West Virginia, and themselves, and to make my personal acquaintance with the operators of West Virginia, in order that we could explain to them the object of the joint movement; as I believe that the West Virginia operators had a wrong idea of why we had the joint movement and as a matter of fact I have met some of the largest operators in West Virginia, and the only obstacle in the way of them taking part in the joint movement was the doubt as to whether my ideas of the policies of our joint movement would be carried into effect."

At page 613 the witness is asked as to a statement made in that convention, that is the Cincinnati Convention, 1910, in regard to fixing a mimimum price for the mining of coal, and a suggestion made to operators that they should combine and raise the price of coal, so as to pay a higher rate of wages to the coal miners: and also explains in this connection certain statements contained in Upstill's Exhibit No. 1, showing the opinion of the witness in regard to the policy to be adopted by the coal operators in order that the coal miners may obtain a higher rate of wages; also a statement of the witness in regard to the policy of the then existing and still existing Sherman Anti-Trust Law, and that this law should either be amended or repealed.

At page 619 the witness says that it is true that he stated to the witness McKinley that it is the policy of the United Mine Workers, if possible, to organize all the mine workers in the United States and Canada, and it is likewise true that it is the policy of the organization to endeavor to secure for the mine workers a fair day's pay for their labor. That the organization has not itself declared in favor of a minimum wage rate at any time. That was a mere declaration that the witness himself had made, and which he believed, if it were possible, there might be made then a perpetual contract. These matters are simply the individual opinions of the witness, who became the president of the organization after this suit was brought, and who retired from that office before this suit was decided.

At page 642 the witness Sullivan says that when the organization desired to get the employes of the Hitchman Company to join the union, it did nothing to prevent the Company from selling its coal north and northwest, or to prevent its properly competing with the coal of the Ohio coal producers. Witness had no such object in view, either as an individual or as a member of the United Mine Workers; the organization had no such object in view, for that would be punishing its own members; that there are miners in the Kanawha field in West Virginia that are running on a union basis.

We have thus reviewed substantially all the evidence appearing in the printed record that is relied upon by the petitioner to show that the United Mine Workers are in a conspiracy or combination with the coal operators of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and western Pennsylvania to unionize West Virginia or to prevent the operators of West Virginia from competing in the market with the coal producers of the State. It seems to us that this part of the record is wholly barren of any evidence to support such a contention.

The purpose of introducing this testimony is to show that this combination or conspiracy, sought in the evidence to be shown to have been formed between this organization and the operators of these states, is that it may result in the destruction of the coal mining industry in West Virginia because, as is contended, they would fix the price of mining coal so high upon the West Virginia operators, that these operators could not compete with the operators in these other states; but which, as we have shown, is not the purpose of the joint conferences had between the operators and coal miners of these states, but on the contrary, to equalize the cost of mining so that all the states, including West Virginia, may compete for the market of the northwest.

It is claimed by the petitioner that it is shown by McKinley's Exhibits Nos. 1, 2 and 4, and Plaintiff's Documentary Exhibit No. 4, that prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit, there was a combination and conspiracy between the coal operators of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Western Pennsylvania, and the United Mine Workers of America to unionize the mines of West Virginia, including that of the petitioner, and that, therefore, the organization is not attempting to unionize the mine of the petitioner in a lawful manner, but as the result of a conspiracy.

Let us examine McKinley's Exhibit No. 4, and ascertain what it is, and whether or not it discloses any conspiracy. This exhibit is a report of a joint conference of the operators and coal miners of western Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana held at Cincinnati in 1910. The Illinois operators were not represented in this conference and were not connected with it.

An examination of this report of the proceedings of this conference shows that its purpose was > "To endeavor to negotiate a wage contract for a fixed period, beginning April 1, 1910," for the mining districts represented in that conference in Ohio, Indiana and Western Pennsylvania. There were 371 delegates in this conference, of whom 72 were operators and 299 were miners. Out of all this large number of delegates, a very few said anything about the West Virginia coal field, and all that was said by these delegates to this conference was provoked by the submission on the part of the miners of a proposition for an increase of wages. This proposition appears in McKinley's Exhibit No. 4 at pages 15 and 16. This report shows great opposition by the operators to an acceptance of the wage rate demanded by the miners in this proposition, and great insistence upon it by the mines. The discussion of the differences between the operators and miners in this conference continued for a period of three weeks, and including the business transactions, make a printed volume of 485 pages.

It was during this discussion that the statements in that conference were made by about three of the operators and three or four of the miners which appear in the opinion of the District Court at pp. 665-675.

The petitioner claims that it was shown by the record in this McKinley Exhibit No. 4 that in a joint conference between the coal operators and miners held in Chicago in 1898, there was a mutual understanding or promise that they would co operate in trying to organize West Virginia and other non-union districts engaged in mining coal

A further examination of the other exhibits relied upon to prove this promise or understanding, will show that they consist of statements or declarations, just as those made in McKinley's Exhibit No. 4. There is not one scintilla of evidence or proof that such an understanding or promise was ever entered upon or made in the joint conference at Chicago in 1898. Proof of this alleged promise or understanding, which is denominated a combination or conspiracy, consists in statements which in the law of evidence are only declarations made by certain parties in these exhibits. The direct evidence in the record which shows anything, disproves any such undertaking or promise.

It needs no argument to say that such a promise cannot be received as evidence by mere declarations or statements to prove it, as against the respondents parties to this suit, as such evidence is mere hearsay. If it is sought to make out a conspiracy by what took place in the joint conference at Chicago, the same rule applies. The declarations cannot be used until such conspiracy is first established.

The purpose of this conference at Chicago is fully explained by the witness in his testimony appearing in the record begining at page 575 and including page 577.

The answer, however, to all of this effort to prove an attempt on the part of the United Mine Workers to be in co-operation with these operators to unionize West Virginia coal mines, which includes of course the mine of the petitioner, is that there is no allegation of this sort made in the bill, and that such evidence will therefore not be considered.

That evidence will not be considered in a cause in support of a fact not alleged in the bill, is a settled principle of the law,

These determine the issues of the cause; and it is a fundamental rule of evidence that no proof is admissible in behalf of either party unless it relates to the facts alleged in the pleadings. A court will not notice matter, however clearly proved, unless it is put in issue. Omissions and allegations in the bill cannot be supplied by evidence. As commonly stated, the rule is that the proof must conform to the allegations. Allegations unsupported by proof amount to nothing and proof that does not sustain the case made in the bill or the defense set up in the answer is ineffectual for any purpose. The allegata and probata must reciprocally meet and conform to each."

The learned Circuit Court of Appeals examining this phase of the case, in passing thereon, in conclusion said:

> "The documentary evidence consisted of the the declarations of a small percentage of the miners and operators who were present at these conferences. It was not shown that either before or after these declarations were made that those participating in the conference had entered into a conspiracy for an unlawful purpose. Indeed, these declarations were brought out in response to a proposition on the part of the miners for an increase of wages. A fair interpretation of the evidence shows that it was the purpose of the defendants to induce the miners of West Virginia to become members of the organization, and thereby secure as high wages as possible, compatible with the successful operation of the mines of that state by the respective owners. They had a perfect right to form a combination to accomplish such purposes by peaceable and lawful methods, and so long as they refrained from resorting to unlawful measures to effectuate the same they could not be said to be engaged in a conspiracy to unionize plaintiff's mine
> As we have already stated, the evidence fails to show that any unlawful methods were resorted to by these defendants in this instance. Therefore the court erred in holding the organization to be unlawful upon the theory that it was guilty of a conspiracy."

The Labor Union, Known as The United Mine Workers of America, Does not Constitute a Common Law Couspiracy.

The courts, both state and federal, generally hold that a labor organization is lawful, and does not, therefore, constitute a conspiracy. The definition of a conspiracy given by Chief Justice Fuller in Pettibone v. United States, 148 U. S. 197, 37 L. ed. 419, is the one usually given by the courts and law writers:

> "A conspiracy is a combination of two or more persons, by concerted action, to accomplish a criminal or unlawful purpose, or some purpose not in itself criminal or unlawful, by criminal or unlawful means."

In this case the charge is, that the respondents and those associated with them, prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit, had formed themselves into a conspiracy for the purpose of unionizing the petitioner's mine without its consent, and in violation of the constitution and common and statutory law of West Virginia. If the combination itself is unlawful, the unlawful purpose must actuate its formation. In other words, if it is sought to show that the combination itself is unlawful, it must be shown that the underlying motive, purpose or object of its creation is unlawful.

The authorities which we have already cited in this brief show quite conclusively that the United Mine Workers as a labor organization is not a conspiracy within the meaning of the law. If it is a lawful organization and its objects are lawful is it shown in this case that it was attempting to carry out the purposes of its organization by unlawful mean?

It seems to us quite clear that there was no attempt to compel the petitioner to unionize its mine against its consent. This is impossible in the very nature of the act necessary to unionize a mine. If there is any act at all imputable to the respondents it is that they sought to induce the employes of the petitioner to become members of the United Mine Workers of America. This, of course, the petitioner was opposed to on account of the pique of its managing officers, which grew out of the refusal of the organization to allow its members to work as members of the union in the absence of a contract defining the wages and conditions of their employment.

If the organization permitted this in one instance, it would have to do so in all instances, and then the very purposes of the organization would thereby be defeated and the union practically destroyed.

After the petitioner decided to run on a non-union basis, there is no evidence of the formation of any combination having for its purpose the unionizing of the petitioner's mine without its consent. Nor is there any evidence in the record, nor could there be any evidence produced, showing that the respondents combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy under the name of the United Mine Workers of America for any purpose, after the petitioner started to run its mine non-union in June, 1906.

To illustrate that a labor organization is not a conspiracy, we cite the case of State v. Stewart, 59 Vt. 273, 59 Am Rep. 710, 712. This was an indictment against certain parties who, it was alleged, had combined to prevent by violence and intimidation, an employer from retaining or employing certain persons or employes from entering into its service. Speaking of the labor organization in its opinion, the court says:

> "In England and here, it is lawful, and it may be added, commendable, for any body of men to associate themselves together for the purpose of bettering their condition in any respect, financial or social. The very genius of free institutions invites them to higher levels and better fortunes. They may dictate their own wages, fraternize with their own associates, choose their own employers, and serve man and mammon according to the dictates of their own conscience."

Immaterial Evidence Introduced into the Cause by the Petitioner.

An examination of the record discloses that the petitioner introduced into the case a vast volume of evidence showing the method of conducting its business during the time that it was running its mine union, extending from some time in 1903 until the first of April, 1906. At the close of the scale agreement existing between the petitioner and the United Mine Workers during the period just mentioned, the record discloses that the petitioner was willing to continue to run on a union basis, but by reason of a disagreement with reference to a certain part of the scale, the petitioner did not sign the scale, and as under the regulations of the organization it was necessary for this scale to be adopted by mutal agreement, the the petitioner did not run its mine after about the middle of April, 1906, and remained idle until it began to run non-union. The position of the respondents with reference to the testimony showing the strikes on the part of the employes of petitioner while it ran on a union basis, the time lost incident to these strikes, and the difficulties enctountered by petitioner to supply engine coal to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, has no bearing upon the issues made by the bill and answers thereto in this case.

The learned District Judge allowed the testimony to go in under exceptions, which were duly taken, but were overruled on the final hearing, and all this testimony was considered by the learned District Court as being relevant to the issues in this case. The parts of the record containing this immaterial and irrelevant testimony are as follows:

Evidence of E. T. Hitchman marginal pp. 302, 304, 305; R. J. Cotts, pp. 311-318; W. H. Koch, pp. 325-338, 340-349; E. C. Pickett, pp. 364-366; B. C. Rowand, pp. 377-381; John Oliver, 384-388; Wesley Corns, pp. 393-396; R. J. Cotts (recalled), pp. 399, 401; Wm. M. Daugherty, pp. 410 423; Albert Jarrett, pp. 444-446; James Jarrett, pp. 450-453; J. C. McKinley, pp. 460, 461, 475-478, 480, 484, 485. 491-496; John H. Sivert, pp. 522-524; John Mooney, 527-531; Robert Myers, pp. 536-539; B. C. Rowand, (recalled), pp. 543-549; E. A. Upstill, pp. 560-570.

An examination of the record at the pages referred to above discloses that nearly all of it relates to matter connected with the mine of the petitioner while it was run on a union basis, and during the period intervening between the time it ceased operations at its mine until it resumed on a non-union basis in June, 1906. All this matter is collateral and does not bear upon the issues made by the pleadings in this cause.

It will be seen that the petitioner complains of strikes which took place during the time the mine was running on a union basis.

This testimony also attempts to show why the mine did not continue to run on a union basis at the expiration of the term of its union scale; although it is clear from this evidence that the disagreement between the parties arose from the difference as to the price or scale for run of mine coal.

If this testimony amounts to anything at all, it simply shows the reason why the petitioner decided to run its mine non-union, beginning in June, 1906. Of course, the petitioner had the right to decline to renew its relations with the organization, and refuse to operate its mine on a union basis, if it so elected.

After the mine resumed operation on a non-union basis, any evidence of combination, conspiracy, intimidation and coercion to prevent the petitioner from running its mine non-union would be competent. The evidence referred to does not bear on the issue that the respondents were using unlawful means to prevent petitioner from operating its mine on a non-union basis. And it does not bear on the issue whether this is a lawful organization, or whether the acts of the responents imputed to them after the petitioner started to run its mine non-union, and up to the time it instituted this suit, were unlawful in connection with the operation of the mine of the petitioner.

The individual experience of one operator, or even two operators, as to how the business of the United Mine Workers was carried on at his mine, through the agency of a single local union whose members went on a strike and caused inconvenience and damage to the petitioner, cannot possibly bear upon any of the issues raised in this cause. As we have just said, this makes a collateral issue. It would be necessary to determine in each particular case, with great volumes of evidence probably, whether or not these strikes were justified on the part of the men; and if they were, the petitioner could not have any legal ground of complaint.

We respectfully submit that the merits of this case are with the respondents.

Notice

To the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, a Corporation, Appellant in the above entitled cause No. 241:

POOR COPY

You are hereby respectfully informed that upon the calling of said cause No. 241 on the docket for hearing on the merits thereof the appellees therein, John Mitchell, T. L. Lewis, W. B. Wilson and the other appellees named in said cause No. 241, will move the court to dismiss the appeal allowed therein, for want of jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States to hear and determine the same, specifying the following as the ground of said motion:

It appears from the bill filed by the said Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, appellant in said cause, that the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States in and for the Northern District of West Virginia, (now the District Court therein), was invoked by you on the ground of diverse citizenship, and upon no other ground whatsoever; and it further appears from said bill that the appellant at the time of the filing of said bill was a citizen of the State of West Virginia, and that the appellee John Mitchell was then a citizen of the State of Indiana, and that the appellees T. L. Lewis, William Green, D. H. Sullivan, George W. Savage, A. R. Watkins, John Zelenka, Lee Rankin and Thomas Hughes were at that time, respectively, citizens of the State of Ohio, and that the appellee, W. B Wilson, was then a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania. You are further informed that under the Act of March 3, 1891, 26 Stat. at L. 826, U. S. Comp. 1901, 547, and the Act of March 3, 1911, section 128,

> "the judgments and decrees of the Circuit Courts of Appeals shall be final in all cases in which the jurisdiction is dependent entirely upon the opposite parties to the suit or controversy, being * * * citizens of different States."

Inasmuch, therefore, as the jurisdiction of the court in said cause, designated as No. 241, depended entirely upon the opposite parties to the suit being citizens of different States, the decree rendered therein by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit is final, and cannot be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States by appeal as has been attempted in this cause.

John Mitchell, T. L. Lewis,
W. B. Wilson, William Green,
D. H. Sullivan, George W. Savage,
A. R. Watkins, John Zelenka, Lee Rankin and Thomas Hughes, and others, appellees.

By Counsel.

CHARLES E. HOGG,
Counsel for the Appellee.

I, Charles E. Hogg, a member of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, hereby certify that I prepared the foregoing notice of motion for dismissal of the appeal in the foregoing cause designated as No. 241; that the same is not for the purpose of delay, and that in my opinion said motion is meritorious and well founded in law, and ought to be sustained.

CHAS. E. HOGG,
Counsel.

And the said HITCHMAN COAL & COKE COMPANY, A CORPORATION, petitioner in the petition and motion for a writ of certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit is hereby further respectfully informed that inasmuch as the said cause No. 241 and the said petition and motion No. 617 are to be heard together, the respondents to said petition and motion, John Mitchell, T. L. Lewis, W. B. Wilson and the other respondents therein named, in the event that the Court shall conclude that the said petition presents a proper case for the allowance of a writ of certiorari and shall treat the record of the appeal in said cause No. 241 as constituting a return to such writ, will move the court to affirm the decree rendered by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals with costs to the respondents.

CHARLES E. HOGG,
Counsel for Respondents.

BRIEF OF COUNSEL FOR APPELLEES ON THE MOTION TO DISMISS THE APPEAL ALLOWED IN THE SAID CAUSE NO. 241.

Statement.

The said cause No 241 is a suit in equity brought by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, the appellant, against John Mitchell, T. L. Lewis, W. B. Wilson, and the other appellees, individually, and in their capacity as officers of the United Mine Workers of America.

The bill therein was filed in October, 1907, and an inspection thereof shows that substantially it alleges:

> That the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company at the time of the institution of the said suit was a citizen of the State of West Virginia, and that the appellee John Mitchell was a citizen of Indiana, the appellees T. L. Lewis, William Green, D. H. Sullivan, George W. Savage, A. R. Watkins, John Zelenka, Lee Rankin and Thomas Hughes were citizens of the State of Ohio, and the appellee W. B. Wilson a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania (Record pp 2-3); that the appellant was then engaged in the business of mining and marketing coal in West Virginia and other States (Record pp. 3-4); that prior to April 1, 1906, appellant operated its mines by men affiliated with the United Mine Workers of America, and that beginning with and in the month of June, 1906, it began the operation of its mines on a non union basis and has continued to so run its mine ever since (Record pp. 4 5); since the appellant put its mine upon a non-union basis the United Mine Workers of America have sought and are now seeking by inducements, threats and intimidation, but so far without physical violence, to cause the employes of the appellant to leave its service, and to cause others who have engaged in their service to break their engagements of service and not work for appellant and to prevent others from working for it (Record p. 5); that the United Mine Workers of America, not incorporated, is a secret voluntary organization having certain express objects, some legal and others unlawful; and then the bill sets forth excerpts from the National, District and Sub-district constitutions of this Union (Record pp. 6-15); that the appellees have unlawfully formed a conspiracy to cause the appellant's mine to be shut down, its plant to remain idle, its contracts to be broken and unfulfilled until such time as appellant shall Unionize its plant (Record pp. 16-17).

The bill then proceeds to set forth the action of the United Mine Workers in certain of their conventions relating to the organization of mines in West Virginia on a Union basis which will be found in the bill at pages 17-20. Then the bill sets forth the efforts, peaceable in character, of the United Mine Workers to induce the appellant to restore its mine to the Union basis (Record pp. 22-25).

It is then alleged in the bill that the United Mine Workers of America are under their constitutions violating the common and statutory law of West Virginia as well as the constitution of the State, and then follows a specification of the parts of their constitution that are in violation of the constitution and laws of West Virginia.

The appellant then files copies of the International and District constitutions as a part of its bill (Record pp. 25-26).

After setting forth the respective characters in which the appellees are sued, naming them, the bill avers the specific ground upon which it invokes the jurisdiction of the federal court and makes this allegation:

"That the jurisdiction of this court is invoked on the ground that your orator is a resident of the Northern District of West Virginia and a citizen of said State, and that each of the said defendants is a resident of a different State, to wit: no defendant is a resident of the State of West Virginia, and that the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum of $2,000."

In this connection the bill of the appellant further alleges,

> "Your orator says that while membership of the said United Mine Workers of America, of the said District No 6 U M. W. A. and of said Sub District 5 of District 6 U. M. W. A. is large as hereinbefore stated, yet the names and addresses of the said members of the said several associations are to your orator unknown; that if any of them should happen to be residents of the State > of West Virginia they are not necessary parties hereto, are not interfering with your orator in the matters herein complained of, and that they cannot be joined without ousting the jurisdiction of this court as to the other parties, the said defendants hereto, of whose actions and doings, purposes and proposed acts and doings, your orator herein complains as hereinbefore set forth."

> (Record p. 26).

The bill then alleges that unless the appellees are enjoined from so doing they will shut down appellant's mine, destroy its business, and without the consent and against the will of the appellant, compel it to recognize appellees in the further prosecution of its business (Record pp. 26 27); that for this purpose the appellant states upon information and belief that the appellees will use intimidation, violence and abusive language, picket the appellant's premises, and specifies other unlawful acts (Record p. 27).

Then follows the prayer of the bill for an injunction (Record pp. 27-31).

It will thus be perceived from the synopsis here given of the appellant's bill filed in its suit against the appellees in the Circuit Court of the United States (now the District Court) for the Northern District of West Virginia, that it invoked the jurisdiction of that court on the sole and only ground of diverse citizenship.

The constitution and laws of the United States were not mentioned in the bill, nor was any dispute or controversy raised or made therein as to the effect or construction of the Federal Constitution or laws on the determination of which the result of the suit depended; nor any title, right, privilege or immunity specially set up or other claim under the federal constitution or laws or treaties made in pursuance thereof.

The whole theory of the bill of the appellant filed in the said Circuit Court is that the wrongful acts imputed to the appellees, and the labor union of which they were members, and the National and District constitutions under which they were acting as a Union are in violation of the common and statute law of West Virginia.

The answers of the several defendants appearing in the record at pages 53-84 admit the citizenship of the various defendants as alleged in the said bill. The answers do not controvert or deny the allegation in the bill that the jurisdiction of the court is invoked by the appellant on the ground of diverse citizenship.

After the trial and submission of the cause to the District Court for decision, the court in its opinion impliedly holds that the United Mine Workers of America is an organization or combination amounting to an unreasonable or undue restraint of trade in inter-state commerce, and is therefore in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law (Record pp. 660-661, 680, 693).

As already stated, there is not a single allegation in the bill charging that the appellees or any of them are engaged in any acts, or threatening to do any act, in violation of any law of Congress or part or provision of the Constitution of the United States.

The imputation in the opinion of the District Court wherein this suit was originally brought, that the union or organization of which the appellees were members is in violation of the Sherman Anti Trust Law is absolutely unauthorized by the pleadings in the cause.

The District Court rendered its final decree on January 18, 1913, perpetuating the injunction theretofore awarded in this case (Record pp. 694-701). From this decree an appeal was duly taken to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, and upon this appeal the decree of the said District Court was on May 28, 1914, reversed and the cause remanded with instructions to dismiss the bill at the costs of the appellant.

On August 15, 1914, an appeal was allowed from the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit by Honorable J. C. Pritchard, one of the Judges thereof, to this court, upon petition of the said Hitchman Coal & Coke Company which has been duly filed and docketed in this court.

After filing the record of the appeal in the above entitled cause No. 241, in this court at the October Term, 1914, the said Hitchman Coal & Coke Company presented its petition to this court, accompanied with a certified copy of the entire record in said cause No. 241 as it is in said Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, supplemented by the original documents described in said petition, and moved this Honorable Court for a writ of certiorari directed to the Honorable Judges of the said Circuit Court of Appeals, to certify to this Court for its review and determination the said cause in which said appeal was allowed, and the said petition and motion for a writ of certiorari is designated as No. 617.

The said appeal No. 241 and said petition and motion for writ of certiorari designated as No. 617 are docketed together and are to be disposed of by this Honorable Court at one and the same hearing. The appellees in said appeal No. 241, being the same persons who are respondents to the petition for writ of certiorari No. 617, in the event that this court shall determine that the decree of the Court of Appeals ought to be reviewed on the merits of the case upon writ of certiorari, will insist upon the hearing thereof that this Honorable Court affirm the said decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals.

The Ground of Motion for the Dismissal of Said Appeal Number 241, as now must be to this Court apparent, is that the jurisdiction of the court that originally heard and decided the cause depending entirely upon the diversity of the citizenship of the parties thereto, the decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, made therein on May 28, 1914, is final and cannot be reviewed by this Court on an appeal.

The Law Relating to This Motion

It is firmly settled by repeated decisions of this Court that the judgment or decree of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals is final, in a cause wherein the jurisdiction of the Circuit court (now District Court) depends entirely upon the diverse citizenship of the parties to the suit.

While the cases above named arose under section 6 of the Act of 1891. the provisions thereof are substantially the same as those contained in section 128 of the Act of March 3, 1911, so far as the question arising on this motion is concerned. Hence the decision in the cases just cited are applicable here.

In Huguley Manufacturing Company v. Galleton Cot- ton Mills, 184 U. S. 290, 46 Law. Ed. 546, this court in its opinion, delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, said:

> "The act of March 3, 1891, chap. 517 (26 Stat. at L. 826) provides in sec. 6 that the circuit courts of appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction to review judgments and decrees of the circuit courts in all cases in which a direct appeal is not allowed by section 5 to this court, and that the judgments and decrees of the circuit courts of appeals shall be final in all cases in which the jurisdiction is dependant entirely on diversity of citizenship.
> The jurisdiction referred to is the jurisdiction of the circuit court as originally invoked. Colorado Cent. Consol. Min. Co. v. Turck, 150 U. S. 138, 37 L. ed. 1030, 14 Supt. Ct. Rep. 35; Press Pub. Co. v. Monroe, 164 U. S. 105, 41 L. ed. 367, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40; Ex parte Jones, 164 U. S. 681, 41 L. ed. 601, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep 222; American Sugar Ref. Co. v. In Omaha Electric Light & Power Co. v. Omaha, 230 U. S. 123, 57 Law. Ed. 1419, wherein it was contended that this Honorable Court had jurisdiction of the appeal, upon the contention of the appellant that a federal question was involved, the court refusing to uphold this contention, in its opinion said:

> "The relief sought was a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants from disconnecting the plaintiff's wires or interfering with or impeding its business as theretofore conducted. There was no prayer that the resolution be pronounced void, nor any allegation that it impaired the franchise contract, or would operate to deprive the plaintiff of its property without due process of law, nor any reference to the Constitution of the United States, or any of its provisions, nor even a general statement that a constitutional right was being or about to be infringed.
> Tested by the recognized standard, we think the bill did not state a case arising under the Constitution. It did not show, either in terms or by necessary intendment, that the plaintiff was asserting a right, privilege, or immunity under the > Constitution, or was in anywise invoking its protection. For anything that appeared, the plaintiff was planting its right to relief entirely upon the doctrine of estoppel. As a basis of jurisdiction, it is not enough that recovery might be sought upon a constitutional ground for it must clearly appear that it is actually so sought. Crowwell v. Randall, 10 Pet. 368, 392, 9 L. ed. 458, 467; Hanford v. Davies, 163 U. S. 273, 280 41 L. ed 157, 159, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1051.

> It being thus apparent that diverse citizenship was the sole ground upon which the jurisdiction of the circuit court was invoked, it follows that the decision of the circuit court of appeals was final. Spencer v. Duplan Silk Co. 191 U. S. 526, 48 L. ed 287, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174; Bankers' Mut. Casualty Co. v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 192 U. S. 371, 48 L. ed. 484, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 325; Shulthis v McDougal, 225 U. S. 561, 569, 56 L. ed. 1205, 1210, 32 Supt. Ct. Rep. 704; Lovell v. Newman, 227 U. S. 412, ante, 577, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 375; Denver v New York Trust Co. 229 U. S. 123, ante, 1101, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657."

In Colorado Consolidated Mining Co. v. Turck, 150 U. S. 138, 37 Law. Ed. 1030, on a motion to dismiss or affirm, the court sustaining the motion to dismiss, decided that

> "By the Judiciary Act of March 3, 1891, judgments or decrees of the circuit courts of appeals are final in all cases in which the jurisdiction is dependent entirely upon the diverse citizenship of the parties."

To give the Circuit (now District) Court jurisdiction under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, that it does so arise must appear from the plaintiff's own statement of his claim. In this case it must appear from the allegations contained in appellant's bill.

Spencer v. Duplan Silk Co., 191 U. S. 527, 48 Law. Ed. 287, citing in the opinion Colorado Central Consol. Min. Co. v. Turck, 150 U. S. 138, 37 L. ed. 1030, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 35; Tennessee v. That a federal question is involved must be directly raised by the plaintiff's bill. It is not enough that it may be inferred argumentatively from statements contained therein.

Shulthis v. McDougal 229, U. S. 561, 56 Law. ed. 1205.

If the plaintiff's bill does not show that the case involves a federal question and such a question is developed in the subsequent proceedings in the suit, the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals is nevertheless final, and is not reviewable on appeal.

In Ayers v. Polsdorfer, cited above, the court held that "A judgment of the circuit court of appeals, in a case in which the jurisdiction of the circuit court was invoked solely on the ground of diverse citizenship, cannot be reviewed in the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error because a Federal question arose in the course of the proceedings in the circuit court, even though such question may not be of such a character as would permit the case, under sec. 5 of the judiciary act of 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517. U. S. Com. Stat. 1901, p. 488), to be brought directly from the circuit court to the Supreme Court."

In Third Street & S. R. Co. v. Lewis, cited above, the court decided as follows:

> "A decree of the circuit court of appeals in a case in which the jurisdiction at the outset depended on diversity of citizenship is final, even if another ground of jurisdiction was alleged in a supplemental bill by which a new defendant was made a party."

In Borgmeyer v. Idler, supra, the court held that

> "Where the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court rests solely, at the commencement of the suit, upon the ground of diverse citizenship, the judgment of the circuit court of appeals is final, although other questions are subsequently raised; and if the case is brought to this court from the circuit court of appeals, the writ of error must be dismissed."

In Bagley v. General Fire Extinguisher Co., above cited, the court decided that > "Jurisdiction below depends entirely upon diverse citizenship within the meaning of the act of March 3, 1891, (26 Stat. at. L. 826, 828, chap. 517, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp 547, 549), sec. 6, making judgments of the circuit courts of appeals final in such cases, where that is the only ground of jurisdiction disclosed by the complaint, although a Federal question may have been raised at the trial."

In view of the decisions of this court, some of which we have here cited, the fact that the District Court in which this suit was brought expressed the view in its opinion that the United Mine Workers of America constituted a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, under what is known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, does not bring into this case a Federal question, whereby the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals may be reviewed in this court by appeal.

Did the Jurisdiction of the Circuit (now District) Court Depend Solely on the Diverse Citizenship of The Parties, but Did It also Involve the Construction or Application of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States and the Sherman Anti-Trust Law?

The appellant in its petition for an appeal (Record p. 748) states that the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals is not final, for the reasons set forth in the assignment of errors filed with its said petition. Examining this assignment of errors, presumably the appellant's reasons for stating that the decree complained of is not final are those appearing in errors VII and VIII, (Record, p. 754).

In the former of these errors assigned (No. VII) the appellant states that because of the action of the Circuit Court of Appeals in refusing "to perpetuate said injunction, decreed in said district court, by reversing said decree and ordering the dismissal of said bill," the appellate court thereby deprived the appellant of its contractual and property rights, as described in its bill of complaint, and as guaranteed to it by the Fifth Amendment and by the Fourteenth Amendment, to the Constitution of the United States.

The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution has no application to a case of this kind. It is settled law that the Fifth Amendment acts as a limitation upon the exercise of power by the National Government.

> Munn v. People of Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 Law. Ed., 77, in the opinion of the latter report at page 83.
>
> Davidson v. Board of Adm'rs of New Orleans, 96 U. S., 97, 24 Law. Ed. 616 in the opinion of the court.
>
> Ex Parte Spies, 123 U. S. 131, 31 Law Ed. 80, in the opinion.
> Kelley v. Pittsburg, 104 U S. 78, 26 Law. Ed. 658.

It is scarcely necessary to state that this is one of the early amendments to the Constitution, and, as stated in the opinion of this court in the case of Ex Parte Spies, supra,

> "That the first ten articles of amendment were not intended to limit the powers of the State Government in respect to their own people, but to operate on the National Government alone, was decided more than half a century ago, and that decision has been steadily adhered to since."

In support of this statement of the construction placed by the court on the Fifth Amendment a great number of decisions of this court are cited.

In Davidson v. Board of Admrs. of New Orleans, supra, the court in the course of its opinion makes this observation:

> "It is not a little remarkable, that while this provision has been in the Constitution of the United States, as a restraint upon the authority of the Federal Government, for nearly a century, and while, during all that time, the manner in which the powers of that government have been exercised has been watched with jealousy, and subjected to the most rigid criticism in all its branches, this special limitation upon its powers has rarely been invoked in the judicial forum or the more enlarged theatre of public discussion."

An examination of the bill in this case clearly shows that the appellant is making no complaint of the exercise of any power or authority or the doing of any act of the General Government depriving it, or which threatens to deprive it, of any of its property or property rights.

Neither has the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States any application to this case. Presumably the appellant is relying in said assignment of error upon that part of section I of this Amendment which provides that,

> "nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The reading of this section of the Fourteenth Amendment clearly implies that it operates as a prohibition upon the States and not upon individuals; and this is the judicial construction placed upon this amendment.

Kiernan v. Multnomah County, 95 Fed. 849; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3, 27 Law. Ed. 836. Younger v. Judah (Mo.) 16 L. R. A., 558. Ex Parte Commonwealth of Virginia, 100 U. S. 313, 25 Law. Ed. 667.

Claybrook v. City of Owensborough, 16 Fed. 297, 301.

In Ex Parte Commonwealth of Virginia, supra, the court decides that > "The prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment have reference to State action exclusively, and not to any action of private individuals."

In the Civil Rights Cases, supra, the court in the course of its opinion said:

> "It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation, and State action of every kind, which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, or which injures them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the laws."

And in Claybrook v. City of Owensboro, supra, after quoting Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, the court in its opinion said:

> "This section gives a citizen of the United States or of a state, and even persons who are not citizens, an additional guaranty to the enjoyment of their fundamental rights. This guaranty is not against individual action or encroachment, but against the state, and its laws and its officers. These rights of the citizen are still to be protected and enforced, as between man and man, by and through state laws and agencies, and not by the United States and its laws. Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313; U. S. v. Harris, 106 U. S. 629; S. C. 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 601; Le Grand v. U. S. 12 Fed. Rep. 577."

The bill does not complain of any act of the State of West Virginia violative of any of the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. On the contrary, the bill avers that the appellees by the acts imputed to them are violating the constitution, common and statutory law of West Virginia, under and by virtue of which appellant invokes the jurisdiction of the court, seeking relief by injunction. The appellant by its bill avers that the appellees are disturbing its property rights contrary to the constitution and laws of West Virginia. How then does the construction or application of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution arise in this case? It must arise upon the case made by the appellant in its bill, and not otherwise. But the appellant makes no case in its bill showing any act of the State violative of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Therefore, the bill fails to present a federal question predicated upon the construction or application of any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

Now, the Eighth error assigned imputes error to the Circuit Court of Appeals in holding that the United Mine Workers of America do not constitute a combination in restraint of trade or inter-state commerce under the Sherman Anti-Trust Law.

It is contended that this part of the opinion and decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, set out in Error VIII, relieves from the finality of its decree in this case. In other words, that the case involves a federal question arising upon the alleged application of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law.

As already stated, no mention is made of or allusion to, any federal statute or law in the bill, of which any act or acts imputed to the appellees are in violation,

It is charged that the United Mine Workers of America constitute a conspiracy, but there is no allegation in the bill or facts alleged showing that it is a conspiracy "in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations."

It is well settled by the decisions of this Honorable Court that if jurisdiction depends on a federal question that it must appear on the record by

> "a statement in legal and logical form, such as is required in good pleading, that the suit is one which does really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy as to a right which depends on the construction of the constitution or some law or treaty of the United States, before jurisdiction can be maintained on this ground."

1 Street Fed. Eq. Proc. sec. 317, citing Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Ann Arbor R. R. Co. (1900) 178 U. S. 239, 44 L. ed. 1052, 20 Sup Ct. 867, 869; Little York Gold-Washing & Water Co v. Keyes (1877) 96 U. S 199, 24 L. ed. 656; Blackburn v. Portland Gold Min. Co (1900) 175 U. S. 571, 44 L. ed. 276, 20 Sup. Ct. 222.

As was said by this Honorable Court in Press Publishing Co. v. Monroe, 164 U. S. 105, 41 Law. Ed. at page 369, a case in which it was sought to review a judgment of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals upon a writ of error but which this court dismissed for want of jurisdiction:

> "The complaint, alleging that the plaintiff was a citizen of Illinois and the defendant a citizen of New York, and claiming damages in a sum of more than $2,000, showed that the circuit court had jurisdiction of the case by reason of the parties being citizens of different states. The plaintiff, in her complaint, did not claim any right under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or in any way mention or refer to that Constitution or to those laws; and, at the trial, she relied wholly upon a right given by the common law, and maintained her action upon such a right only."

And as was also said by this court in Spencer v. Duplan Silk Co., 191 U. S 529, 48 Law. Ed. at page 290, in which it was sought by the plaintiff in error to maint in the jurisdiction of this court on a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals, on the ground that it involved a federal question, in which the opinion in the case of Press Publishing Co. v. Monroe, supra, is quoted with approval and the law therein stated reaffirmed:

> "In the present case it is contended that the jurisdiction was not dependent entirely on the opposite parties to the suit being citizens of different states, because the suit arose under the laws of the United States, and that, therefore, jurisdiction rested also on that ground. But a suit does not so arise unless it really and substantially involves a dispute or controversy as to the effect or construction of the Constitution, or validity or construction of the laws or treaties of the United States, upon the determination of which the result depends, and which appears in the record by plaintiff's pleading. Arbuckle v. Blackburn, 191 U. S. 406, ante, 239, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 148; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ann Arbor R. Co. 178 U. S. 239, 44 L. ed. 1052, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 867; Muse v. Arlington Hotel Co. 168 U. S. 430, 42 L. ed. 531, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 109."

So in the case now before the court, inasmuch as the bill contains an allegation that the appellant is a citizen of West Virginia and that the appellees are citizens of States other than West Virginia, that the amount in controversy exceeds the sum of $2,000, avers specifically that the jurisdiction of the court is invoked because of the citizenship of the parties to the suit, and then further avers that if any of the members of the United Mine Workers happen to be residents of West Virginia they are not necessary parties and that they cannot be joined in the suit without ousting the jurisdiction of the court, can there be any question, or does it admit of argument, that the jurisdiction of the Circuit (now District) Court in this case depended solely upon the diverse citizenship of the parties? It seems to us conclusively clear that no other ground of jurisdiction is shown to exist in this case.

For the reasons here given, and upon the authorities cited, the appellees, upon the calling of said case No. 241 for hearing upon the merits, will move the Supreme Court of the United States to dismiss the same for want of jurisdiction.

I.

RESPONDENTS CRITICISE THE SCOPE OF THE BILL AND THE SCOPE OF THE EVIDENCE INTRODUCED ON THE TRIAL.

Reply brief, pp. 2–9; 17–25.

It is for the pleader to make his own pleading, and the scope of the bill is to be determined by a consideration of the facts set forth in the bill and the statements and prayer for relief contained therein.

The immediate occasion for the plaintiff filing its bill was the effort of the United Mine Workers of America to bring about the unionizing of plaintiff's mine in 1907. And the immediate purpose in the granting of the injunction was to save to the plaintiff such rights as it claimed to have and as the Court thought it reasonably did have.

Certain statements and allegations are made in the bill for the purpose of setting forth to the Court all of the facts surrounding the doing of the acts which were the immediate occasion of the application for a restraining order in October, 1907, and as indicative of the design of the defendants it is set forth in the bill that these acts are part and parcel of a certain plan of these defendants as directing officers of the United Mine Workers of America; and then that organization is attacked in the bill as being a monopoly at common law.

The attention of the Court is thereby directed to the fact that whatever these people are doing—whether their acts at the time be otherwise lawful—they are doing those lawful acts pursuant to their existence as an unlawful body. But going further, the bill sets forth that this unlawful body has its unlawful purposes, and then sets forth that in 1907—pursuant to its unlawful purpose—the defendants in convention resolved to carry out a policy of unionizing all non-union fields. That—it is alleged in the bill—is a further effort on the part of the defendants, generally, throughout the United States, to bring about the unionizing of all fields and the subjection of all coal operations to the control of the United Mine Workers of America.

Passing from the allegation that the Union itself is unlawful; passing the steps that the Union itself took in 1907; generally, to extend its lawful power by the unlawful acts of the attempted organizing of all non-union fields, for the purpose of increasing its power and enabling it to become an irresistible monopoly, and to be able to control absolutely all of the coal mining industry of this country, we come next in the bill to the charge that these defendants participated—some one or more of them—in the convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6, and that at that time, pursuant to the general plan of the organization, which is to be and become a monopoly; pursuant also to the direction of the National Convention to unionize the mines throughout the country, a resolution was passed directing that as soon as it could be done, five mines in the Panhandle District of West Virginia, included within Sub-District 5 of District 6, should be unionized.

Passing that, the bill sets forth that the Hitchman mine was one of the five non-union mines, and then follow the allegations with reference to the attempt to unionize that mine, and to unionize the Glendale mine, and the Richland mine, all in the Panhandle District of West Virginia. Now, it was explanatory, in a way, of how the Union came to try to unionize the Hitchman mine in 1907, and to explain why the Hitchman mine was run non-union, and to explain why the Hitchman mine owners insisted on their right to run non-union, and refuse to have anything to do with these defendants and with this Union, that it is alleged, through the recital of certain conferences, had between some one or more of these defendants and the manager of the Company, that their attention was called to the fact—when these defendants sought to get permission to unionize the mine—that the mine had been run Union but that these defendants had been so oppressive in their conduct, and the business of the Company had been so interfered with, and so much damage had been done to the Company through the unlawful practices and intolerable methods of these Union officials, that the Company would not consent to run its mine Union any longer and that the Company would either run non-union, or it would go out of business.

These allegations are plainly set forth in the bill; they are all facts which the Court should be advised of; and besides being the allegations of the bill, we take it that they are the indicia to control the scope of the testimony which may on a trial be introduced on behalf of the plaintiff. It is a familiar proposition and founded in common sense and fairness that the defendants ought not to be asked to defend themselves against something of which they have not been advised. It is also a familiar proposition that the proof should correspond with the allegations.

We will not quote extensively from the bill, but will ask attention to a few of the allegations which go to substantiate what we have just said.

> "Your orator says that the said United Mine Workers of America, including its said subordinate associations or branches, is a secret voluntary organization having certain expressed objects, some lawful and others unlawful, and that it is in the endeavor to carry out its unlawful purposes, that the matters and things herein complained of by your orator have arisen." (Record, p. 6.)

And then follow a number of excerpts from the Constitutions of the United Mine Workers of America and from the Constitutions of the subordinate bodies, and from the Convention proceedings, all substantiating what we have stated to be in that portion of the bill which sets forth the matter leading to the immediate occasion for the application for the injunction, namely, the immediate effort to unionize the plaintiff's mine in 1907.

Passing to page 18 of the Record, the following language is used:

> "Your orator says that at said convention a committee's report was unanimously adopted, which contained the following: 'Your committee recommend that this convention heartily approve of the board's action in withdrawing a part of our organizing force from active service, as a result of a depleted treasury, but we further recommend that the force be increased whenever, in the discretion of the board, our fund would warrant.' "

Passing to Record, page 20, and speaking of the action of the Sub-District Convention, the bill sets forth that this resolution was adopted:

> "Adopting that suggestion of the defendant, Lee Rankin, the following resolution was then adopted by the convention—
>
> 'RESOLUTION NO. 8.
>
> Whereas, there are miners in the Panhandle District and Ohio that are not organized, and believing every mine should be organized, be it
>
> Resolved, by this Ninth Annual Convention, that the Sub-District officers, together with the District officers, be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the Sub-District as quickly as it can be done.' "

On Record, page 17, this language appears:

> "Your orator further says that it pays as much as the Union scale of wage to its said employes, and that the said defendants in thus unlawfully and maliciously agreeing together, confederating, combining and conspiring to effectuate by unlawful means the unionizing of your orator's mine are simply seeking power, for the purpose of strengthening the Union in future contests with employers of labor, to compel all miners and mine workers to join the Union, establish a monopoly and force employers of that kind of labor, and especially to force your orator to yield to the Union's demands, or else to give up its business."

On Record, page 23, this language appears:

"Your orator says that some time during the middle of this summer of 1907, the defendants, Green, Watkins and Zelenka, called on your orator's general manager at his office and said Green was spokesman. He said he would like to talk organization. Your orator's general manager stated to them then that while unionizing of the mine was out of the question yet if they had any business proposition to submit it would be listened to. Green urged that under your orator's present arrangement or contract with its employes the men felt at liberty to do as they pleased and did not feel any restraint while if your orator would make a contract with him as President of the United Mine Workers (now Secretary-Treasurer of the U. M. W. of A.), he could hold the men in check, see that all agreements incorporated in the scale were fulfilled and carried out to the letter and generally that he would see that the men lived up to their contract. To this, your orator's general manager replied that from personal experience in the past, in dealing with the Union, he had found the facts in reality to be just the opposite from the way Green put it, and that if that was all Green had to offer there was nothing worth considering. Green then requested your orator's general manager to think the matter over and said he would see him again about it within a couple of weeks. Several weeks after this, said Green, Watkins and Zelenka met your orator's general manager, while the latter was at the McLure House, in Wheeling, and the latter then told Green that he could see nothing in the Union's proposition that would interest him in any manner. Green then asked said general manager if he would not put the proposition up to your orator's Board of Directors. This he did, and your orator's Board unanimously refused to have anything whatever to do with the United Mine Workers of America. Shortly after that, said defendant, Green, telephoned your orator's general manager, asked if he had submitted the Union's proposition to your orator's Directors and was told that the proposition had been submitted and that the Directors refused absolutely to consider the matter in any manner whatever."

On Record, page 24, this language appears:

"On one or more of the occasions heretofore referred to when some one or more of said defendants besought your orator to unionize its mine, your orator's general manager stated to said defendants that with them as officers of the Union it was not so much a question of looking after the interests of the men employed by your orator as it was a question of money and that they, these defendants, were in the business for what they could get out of it, and their attention was called to the fact that nearly $10,000 had been turned over to them from the Hitchman mine alone in the two years just prior to the strike."

Passing to Record, page 21, this language appears:

"Your orator says that in refusing to recognize the Union after the declaration of said strike, April 1, 1906, and after its men had left your orator's employment pursuant to said strike, and in thereafter and now running its mine non-union your orator did nor seek to reduce the wages of its said employes nor cause its said employes to work for less than the scale of wages established by said United Mine Workers of America, nor does your orator now seek nor con> template any reduction in the wages of its present employes. Your orator's sole purpose in running non-union and in now insisting upon its right to do so, unhampered by and without interruption from said defendants, acting individually and as representative of the said United Mine Workers of America, was and is to escape from the intolerable oppression and vicious intermeddling of the said defendants.'

Now, these are the substantial averments of the bill which go to set forth to the Court the entire facts out of which the plaintiff's rights arise.

After the case had been to the Circuit Court of Appeals upon an appeal from a decree of Judge Dayton refusing to modify the injunction so as to permit peaceable persuasion in breach of contracts plaintiff had with its employes (172 Fed. 963), which motion had theretofore been submitted upon the bill and affidavits and answers of the defendants, all of these answers were withdrawn (Record pp. 178, 179) and other answers, designed to limit the admissions which had been contained in the first set of answers, were filed. Replications were filed to the last answers, issue was joined and the trial had.

But the answers which had been withdrawn were introduced in evidence on the trail and are in the Record.

Respondents' supplemental brief upon the merits conveniently overlooks admissions made in the first answers. But this Court's attention will be invited to those admissions.

From the joint and several answers of T. L. Lewis, et al. (Record pp. 53–68) filed September 5, 1910, one of the last set of answers, the following excerpts are taken:

> "But these respondents deny and each of them denies that they or any of them have unlawfully interfered in any manner with the operations of the plaintiff in the fulfillment of any of its contracts."

"These respondents, for further answer unto said bill, say that they deny that said United Mine Workers of America, including its said subordinate associations or branches, is a secret, voluntary organization, having certain expressed objects, some lawful and others unlawful, and that it is in the endeavor to carry out its unlawful purposes that the matters and things in said bill complained of have arisen, as in said bill is alleged, and deny that any of the objects, either expressed or otherwise, of said United Mine Workers of America are unlawful, and deny that they are attempting to do anything unlawful in the work of promoting said organization."

"and deny that they have been guilty of any unlawful conduct or acts with reference to the plaintiff's business mentioned in said bill."

"Respondents say that the only thing upon which they were informed or of which they had any knowledge was that plaintiff was running a non-union mine and had declined to unionize its mine."

"these respondents deny that the said defendants have unlawfully and maliciously agreed together, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy, the purpose of which they are proceeding to carry out, and now about to finally accomplish, namely: to cause plaintiff's mine to be shut down, its plant to remain idle, its contracts to be broken and unfulfilled, until such time as plaintiff shall submit to the demand of the Union that it shall unionize its plant, and, having submitted to such demand by employing only Union men, shall become subject to the orders of the Union, paramount to the orders of plaintiff, their employer, as alleged in said bill, and deny that in thus unionizing its plant plaintiff shall surrender its control and the management of its business to the Union and the various rules and regulations laid down by the Union and accede in advance to every demand by said Union that its said officers, agents, employes and servants may make, as in said bill is alleged."

"These respondents further answering said bill say that they do not know, but they believe, that the plaintiff pays as much as the Union's scale of wages to its said employes, but deny that the said defendants unlawfully and maliciously are agreeing together, confederating, combining and conspiring to effectuate by unlawful means the unionizing of plaintiff's mine simply for the purpose of seeking power and for the purpose of strengthening the Union in future contests with employers of labor, and to compel all miners and mine workers to join the Union, and establish a monopoly and force employers of that kind of labor, and especially to force plaintiff, to yield to the Union's demands or else to give up its business, as alleged in said bill."

"These respondents, for further answer unto said bill, say that they admit that at the annual convention of the United Mine Workers of America, held at Indianapolis, Indiana, January 15 to 22, inclusive, 1907, the said defendants John Mitchell, T. L. Lewis, W. B. Wilson, Wil iam Green, D. H. Sullivan, George W. Savage and A. R. Watkins, John Zelenka and Lee Rank n were present and participated in its proceedings, and admit that it was openly stated with reference to the objects of said Union as follows: 'Organized labor contends that as industry cannot exist without labor, labor has the right to say under what conditions it shall be employed' but deny that the expression was used in said meeting, 'thereby dictating the management of the productive end of the business' as in said bill is alleged. These respondents say that the use of the language above quoted does not indicate an intention on the part of said United Mine Workers to dicatate the management of the productive end of the business of coal mining, and respondents deny that there was any language used in said convention conveying the idea or intending to convey the idea that said organization has for its object the dictating of the management of coal mines and the business relating thereto; but these respondents aver that said organization should have the opportunity to be heard, and has the right to say, under peaceable methods and the forms of the law what the conditions ought to be with reference to said mines and the operation thereof to insure health and safety in the mining and production of coal generally, and that this was the matter then before said convention when the language above quoted was used."

"These respondents for further answer say that while they do not recollect distinctly what did occur in the said convention, they believe that it is true that the defendant, T. L. Lewis, stated that he had charge of the organizing force under the direction of the President; that there has been a tremendous loss in the membership of the Union as a result of the strike of May 1, 1906; that he had been instrumental in building up three national organizations of mine workers, and was one of the delegates and attended the convention which laid the foundation of the United Mine Workers of America; that the Union had 'closed shop' wage agreements with operators whereunder 181,384 persons were employed in the year 1905, and that all of those persons were required to be members of the Union; that respondents admit that it was stated in said meeting that the American Continent, meaning, however, the United States and British America, is not large enough to maintain two organizations of miners, and that he, said Lewis, favored one organization of the mine workers of the American Continent and the complete recognition of the Union's right to organize in every mining district in the country.

"And these respondents further aver that they believe, though they do not remember distinctly, that it was said in said convention by the defendant, W. B. Wilson, what is stated in said bill, and admit the same to be true for the purposes of this suit; but these respondents further aver that the occurrences and discussions in said convention, alluded to in said bill, only related to the then condition of the United Mine Workers of America and the consideration of the best policy to promote its objects, which objects are expressed in the constitution and has for its objects the uniting of the mine employes that produce or handle coal or coke in or around the mines, and to ameliorate their condition by methods of conciliation, arbitration, or strikes, and that the proceedings in said convention did not contemplate any interference with the employes of the plaintiff, because they were not then Union men, nor are they now Union men, and such allegations can only be treated as surplusage for the purposes of said bill.

"Respondents further aver that it is true that at said convention a committee's report was unanimously adopted containing the matter set forth in said bill.

"These respondents further admit that that part of the bill setting forth the statements made by T. L. Lewis and John Mitchell are true, but that it was simply a tentative presentation of the situation that then confronted the organization, and did not have for its object the disturbance of plaintiff's mines or the men employed thereat, nor had it anything whatever to do with the plaintiff's business."

"These respondents further answering say that at the convention of Sub-District 5 of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, held in March, 1907, the defendants, A. R. Watkins, Lee Rankin, and T. L. Lewis, John Zelenka, and Thomas Hughes were present and participated in the proceedings. These respondents also admit that that which appears in the bill as being said by A. R. Watkins in his report is true, and that that part of the bill which sets forth what appears in the report of Lee Rankin as Secretary-Treasurer of Sub-District 5 of District 6 is also true; that that part of the bill which sets out Resolution No. 8, as well as Resolution No. 10, is true; but these respondents deny that they are in anywise connected with the operation of the plaintiff's mines, or have anything to do with the interference of the plaintiff's employes."

"These respondents, for further answer unto said bill, say that they have no knowledge, information, or belief, and therefore can neither admit nor deny, the allegation made in said bill that plaintiff, in refusing to recognize the Union after the declaration of said strike of April 1, 1906, and after its men had left plaintiff's employment pursuant to said strike, and in thereafter and now running its mine non-union, did not seek to reduce the wages of said employes or to cause said employes to work for less than the scale of wages established by the United Mine Workers of America, as in said bill is alleged. And these respondents, having no information or belief on the subject, can neither admit nor deny the allegation of said bill that plaintiff's sole purpose in running non-union, and in now insisting upon its right to do so, unhampered by and without interruption from said defendants, acting individually and as representatives of said United Mine Workers of America, was and is to escape from the intolerable oppression and vicious intermeddling of the said defendants; but, be that as it may, these respondents deny that they have attempted to oppress or intermeddle with the business of the plaintiff in any manner whatsoever, but aver that they have only approached the representatives of the said company in a peaceable and law abiding manner and its employes for the purpose of soliciting membership from the employes of the plaintiff to the United Mine Workers of America."

"These respondents, for further answer unto said bill, say that it is true that upon different occasions after starting up non-union, the different officials of the United Mine Workers of America, but not all of them, amongst whom were the defendants, John Zelenka, A. R. Watkins, D. A. Sullivan, and William Green, visited the general manager of the plaintiff at his office at the Hitchman mine, and talked to him on the subject of recognition of the Union, the signing of the scale and the re-employment of plaintiff's employes, but deny that it was under the technical guise of thus entering into contract relations with the plaintiff's employes of the United Mine Workers of America and for the purpose of doing away with the express provisions of plaintiff's contract with each of its employes that they should not become members of the Union, and if they did that their employment should thereby cease, as in said bill is alleged; but these respondents free of any technical guise aver that the said representatives of the United Mine Workers of America openly and fairly visited the general manager of the said plaintiff, was cordially received by him, and informed by him that they could see the men and talk with them, and that if said men desired to join the Union he would interpose no objection thereto, and that the said representatives of the United Mine Workers did not seek to have plaintiff unionize its mine under any technical guise, but desired that the plaintiff should employ Union men at its mines under the usual and ordinary contracts made by the Union in its relations with coal operators; that it is also true that the plaintiff did refuse to enter into any contract with the United Mine Workers having for its object the sole employment of organized labor at its said mines."

"These respondents further say that it is true that about July 1, 1907, the defendants, William Green, John Zelenka, and A. R. Watkins came to the office of plaintiff's general manager and had a conversation with him regarding the forming of a miner's union, or rather the putting of plaintiff's employes under the jurisdiction of the United Mine Workers of America, but deny that plaintiff on that occasion, through its general manager, distinctly stated that the proposition of said defendants would not be considered at all."

"These respondents, for further answer unto said bill, say that it is true that sometime during the middle of this summer of 1907, the defendants, Green, Watkins, and Zelenka, called on plaintiff's general manager at his office, and that said Green was spokesman. The respondents admit that said Green expressed a desire to talk to said general manager in regard to organizing plaintiff's mines, but respondents deny that said general manager stated to them that while unionizing of the mine was out of the question yet if they had any business proposition to submit it would be listened to, and deny the conversation between said parties as set forth in said bill."

"These respondents, for further answer unto said bill, say that it is true that under the rules of the United Mine Workers of America, there was paid by plaintiff to the secretary-treasurer of the local union the amount specified in said bill.

"And these respondents deny that on one or more of the occasions heretofore referred to, as set forth in said bill, when one or more of said defendants sought plaintiff to unionize its mine, plaintiff's general manager stated to said defendants that with them as officers of the union it was not so much a question of looking after the interests of the men employed by the plaintiff as it was a question of money, and deny that they, these defendants, were in the business for what they could get out of it, and deny that such statement to them was made by said general manager, and deny that their attention was called to the fact that nearly $10,000 had been turned over to them from the Hitchman mine alone in the two years just prior to the strike."

"These respondents further say that they deny that the said United Mine Workers of America, and the said International Union United Mine Workers of America, the said District No. 6, United Mine Workers of America, and the said Sub-District 5 of District 6, United Mine Workers of America, are, under their constitutions, violating the common law and statutory law of the State of West Virginia, as well as the Constitution of said State in any manner whatsoever, and especially in the particulars designated in said bill, but aver that the said organizations are in every respect lawful and that their objects and purposes are lawful."

"These respondents for further answer unto said bill say that they deny that said defendants are acting individually and agreeing, confederating, combining and forming themselves into a conspiracy, under the name of the United Mine Workers of America, and deny that they will in pursuance of any unlawful purpose and design, by enticement, persuasion or coercion in any form whatsoever, bring about the shutting down of plaintiff's mine and the ultimate destruction of its business, as alleged in said bill, and deny that they will without the consent and against the will of plaintiff compel plaintiff to recognize said defendants and said associations in the further transaction of its legitimate business in mining and shipping coal, and deny that defendants will compel plaintiff to contract with its employes through the said defendants as officers of the said associations, under such rules and regulations made and enforced by said associations and by said defendant officers as will enable the Union to dictate the persons whom plaintiff shall employ and those whom it shall discharge, the wages it shall pay, and deny that they will compel plaintiff to agree that each of its future employes as members of said United Mine Workers of America shall owe and yield to said Union an allegiance which shall in all things be paramount to that which said employes would owe to plaintiff, and deny that they will thus take charge of, dictate the management of, and virtually control plaintiff's business, and deny that they will perpetrate acts of oppression and wrong upon plaintiff which distinctly violate plaintiff's contractual, common-law, statutory and constitutional rights as a citizen of the State of West Virginia."

"And these respondents deny all unlawful combination, conspiracy, confederacy and unlawful acts of any sort whatsoever sought by the said bill to be imputed to these respondents or to any of them."

The bill in this cause is a very comprehensive one, and the issues, as presented by the bill and the answers, plainly show that there is before the Court, in this case a determination of the question whether the United Mine Workers of America are, under the allegations and under the proof appearing in the Record, a monopoly in the supplying of labor in the coal mining industry in the coal mining States contrary to the common law. This proposition also is before the Court, whether the design of the United Mine Workers of America as carried out pursuant to their constitution, and as carried out pursuant to the actions of its conventions, and especially pursuant to the act of the convention in ordering the unionizing of all non-union fields as soon as funds would permit it, is an unlawful conspiracy contrary to public policy, irrespective of its immediate application to the plaintiff's mine. There is also involved the question of whether the United Mine Workers of America are not conspiring at common law and in violation of plaintiff's rights in carrying out the action of Sub-District 5 of District 6 in attempting in 1907 to unionize plaintiff's mine, and, in attempting, by the motion to modify the injunction in this case (172 Fed. 963) to obtain judicial sanction for the accomplishment of that unlawful purpose, and by now contesting in this Court the right of the plaintiff to run its business in its own way and within the law, without regard to and free from all control and affiliation and dealings with the United Mine Workers of America. There is also involved the question whether the plaintiff is entitled to be protected from the acts of the defendants, not only based upon the other reasons just assigned, but upon the ground that the Company has certain contractual relations with its employes, accentuated by the fact that the defendants are simply intermeddlers.

With these issues presented by the bill and answers a question of the continuing character of the conspiracy necessarily arises.

The conspiracy by the organization to control the coal mining industry, and, in pursuit of that end, the direct efforts to unionize the plaintiff's mine are in addition to the unlawfulness of the organization issues to be determined by this Court, and according as that decision allows or does not allow these defendants to pursue their method of organizing plaintiff's mine, just so far will plaintiff's right to do business be affected.

There is a continuing conspiracy, as a national feature, involved in the existence and in the national work of the United Mine Workers of America, and there is a continuing conspiracy on the part of the defendants in seeking to obtain permission in this Court to unionize plaintiff's mine. The insistence that they have such right, and the abstaining from doing acts to unionize this mine, only as the result of the granting of the injunction which now exists and protects plaintiff in the operation of its mine, and the fact that, if the injunction is dissolved or is modified so as to permit them to go ahead, they would pursue their plan to unionize its mine and put it under the control of themselves is in itself a continuing conspiracy.

This Court in the case of United States v. Kissel and Harned (1910) 218 U. S. 601, said on this subject of conspiracy

> "But when the plot contemplates bringing to pass a continuous result that will not continue without the continuous cooperation of the conspirators to keep it up, and there is such continuous cooperation, it is a perversion of natural thought and of natural language to call such continuous cooperation a cinematographic series of distinct conspiracies, rather than to call it a single one."

And further on in the same pargaraph of the opinion, this language is used:

> "A conspiracy is a partnership in criminal purposes."

Applying that definition of a continuing conspiracy to these defendants, it is plain that this national body exists only to become and to be an irresistible monopoly and an oppressive power in the coal mining industry. It is clear that its existence from its organization in 1890 down to the present time, and its active work in extending its power for this unlawful purpose of controlling the coal mining industry in the United States, is a continuance of a criminal partnership.

It is plain also that these defendants who have conspired to violate plaintiff's rights and to unionize plaintiff's mine have an intention—the moment they are released from the obligation to obey the Court's injunction—to at once carry out the plan they have not yet disavowed. These defendants are today a partnership in that criminal proceeding.

Now, with regard to the scope of the evidence that is admissible. This Court in the case of Holmes v. Goldsmith (1893) 147 U. S., p. 164, says:

> "The modern tendency both of legislation and of the decision of courts is to give as wide a scope as possible to the investigation of facts."

In the case of Moore v. United States (1893) 150 U. S., p. 57 the first and second paragraphs of the syllabus say:

> "When the tendency of testimony offered in a criminal case is to throw light upon a particular fact, or to explain the conduct of a particular person, there is a certain discretion on the part of the trial judge which a court of errors will not interfere with, unless it manifestly appears that the testimony has no legitimate bearing upon the question at issue, and is calculated to prejudice the accused in the minds of the jurors.
> "When a necessity arises for a resort to circumstantial evidence in a criminal trial, objections on > the ground of relevancy are not favored, as the effect of circumstantial facts depends upon their connection with each other, and considerable latitude is allowed on the question of motive."

In the case of Clune v. United States (1895) 159 U. S., pp. 592, 593, speaking of the proof of conspiracy by circumstantial evidence, the Court says:

> "It is familiar law that where a case rests upon that character of evidence much discretion is left to the trial court, and its ruling will be sustained if the testimony which is admitted tends even remotely to establish the ultimate fact."

There is put in issue in this case by the bill, and there is put in issue in one form or another by the answers, the motive of the plaintiff as well as the motive of the defendants. There is put in issue the charge by the plaintiff, while the mine was running Union prior to the strike of 1906, the question whether or not these defendants did tyrannize the over plaintiff and did cause the plaintiff to suffer such loss as to make it determine never to run Union again; and as to the proof of strikes during the time the Company ran Union, it is certainly admissible for the plaintiff to show what treatment it received and what justification it had and now has for its determined opposition to the United Mine Workers of America and for its persistent and continuous refusal since the strike of 1906 to run a Union mine. Likewise it is certainly competent, as explaining plaintiff's experience with the Union, and as explaining why the Company has taken the position it has with regard to that Union to show that it lost large amounts of money and suffered much inconvenience during the time it ran Union.

It is not in this case sought by the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendants for the loss which was caused by the Union strikes in 1903, 1904 and 1906, but it was proper to show the exact facts regarding the loss that the plaintiff did suffer while its mine was under the control and management of these defendants.

Sole Exercise of a Trade.

> "It is a monopoly, and against the policy of the law, for any person or group of persons to secure the sole exercise of any known trade throughout the country."
>
> "Trade and Trade Unions," 27 Laws of England, Halsbury, p. 526, § 1026, and cases cited in note (k).

After a consideration of the rules of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, Lord Shaw of Dunfermline, said:

> "They mean, and appear, to provide the materials and machinery under which, according to the decision and at the direction of the officials of the association, a particular trade may not merely be restrained, but, by concerted action with other branches of industry, that trade and the trade of the country at large may be actually paralyzed."
> Russell v. Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners (1912) A. C. 421, 435.

The United Mine Workers of America have repeatedly paralyzed the trade of this country.

II.

RESPONDENTS CHALLENGE THE CONTENTIONS OF THE PLAINTIFF AND THE FINDINGS OF JUDGE DAYTON UPON THE FOLLOWING POINTS.

(a) Deny they had knowledge of the contracts plaintiff makes with its employes;

(b) Deny they made efforts to get plaintiff's men to quit work and to join their Union;

(c) Deny that Hughes had authority in the premises;

(d) Deny that their representatives tried to induce plaintiff's men to join their Union; and (e) Deny that if the injunction now forbidding it were out of the way they intend to violate plaintiff's contractual rights.

That they intended to do all of these things was found by Judge Dayton in his decree, and upon those facts, together with the unlawfulness of the organization and the conspiracy they were engaged in with Union operators in competitive States, Judge Dayton's opinion and his decree were based.

It has hereinbefore been stated that after Judge Dayton refused to modify the injunction in accordance with the motion made by respondents for that purpose (Record, pp. 37–39; 41–49) and had entered a decree refusing to modify it (Record, pp. 50–52) the defendants (now respondents) withdrew all of the answers which had theretofore been filed and which constituted a part of the case considered by him upon that motion (Record, pp. 178, 179); and they thereafter on September 5, 1910, filed entirely new answers, the substantial difference being that by those new answers they denied practically everything that they had theretofore admitted, and they then called for proof. These last answers are those upon which counsel for respondents now bases his argument.

But from that decree refusing to modify the injunction, respondents appealed to the Circuit Court of Appeals, and on motion of plaintiff that appeal was dismissed on the ground that that Court had no jurisdiction, the basis of the opinion being > "Under Act March 3, 1891, c. 517, § 7, 26 Stat. 828, as amended by Act June 6, 1900, c. 803, 31 Stat. 660 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 550), and Act April 14, 1906, c. 1627, 34 Stat. 116 (U. S. Comp. St.

Supp. 1909, p. 220), which gives a right of appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals from an interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction, to be taken within 30 days, an order overruling a motion to dissolve or modify an injunction previously granted is not one continuing the injunction within the meaning of the statute, and is not appealable."

Lewis v. Hitchman Coal and Coke Company (1910) 176 Fed. 549.

PASSING TO THOSE ANSWERS WHICH WERE WITHDRAWN, WE CALL ATTENTION TO THE FOLLOWING ALLEGATIONS UPON THE POINTS ABOVE MENTIONED.

Respondents admit they had knowledge of the contracts plaintiff makes with its employes.

"it is true, as respondent believes and so avers, that the plaintiff on June 12th did start to run its mine on a non-union basis, and that each and every man who accepted employment at said mine was told at the time of entering plaintiff's employment that there was no union at the mine; that the company would not allow any; that no union man could remain in the employ of the company while recognizing and giving paramount allegiance to the union and its orders, and that if any employes of the company joined the union they could not work any longer for the plaintiff."

Separate Answer of A. R. Watkins (under oath) filed May 26, 1908. (Record pp. 88, 90.)

"it is true * * * that each of said defendants is fully aware that plaintiff is operating a non-union mine and refuses to consent to operate a union mine; that its men are non-union men; that said employes are required by plaintiff at the time of entering its service to agree not to become connected with the union while employed, and that if they do join the union their said employment shall cease; that with such understanding plaintiff's employes entered its employment, and are now working with plaintiff under such contract and condition, as alleged in said bill, but this respondent avers that any condition, stipulation, contracts or agreements on the part of said plaintiff with its said employes as a condition upon which they shall enter into employment and continue in their employment with plaintiff are contrary to public policy, are in restraint of that freedom of contract accorded to all citizens of the United States under and by virtue of its Constitution and the spirit and purpose of its institutions, and cannot be made a condition upon which to base any valid and binding contract or obligation between employer and employe."

Separate Answer of A. R. Watkins (under oath filed May 26, 1908. (Record, pp. 88, 92, 93.)

"It may be true, and is, as respondents believe, that plaintiff on June 12th did start to run its mine on a non-union basis, and that each and every man who accepted employment at said mine was told at the time of entering plaintiff's employment that there was no union at the mine, that the company would not allow any, that no union man could remain in the employ of the company while recognizing and giving paramount allegiance to the union and its orders, and that if any employes of the company join the union they could not work any longer for plaintiff. It may be also true that thereupon, with knowledge of said condition of employment, many men applied to plaintiff for work, and entered its employment under an express contract not to join the United Mine Workers of America, and to work in its mine, and have so continued to work until the present time to the satisfaction of themselves and the plaintiff. But these respondents deny any knowledge on their part or on the part of any of them that the employes of plaintiff were and are required by it at the time of entering its service to agree not to become connected with the union while so employed; and these respondents deny any knowledge on their part or on the part of any of them that if said employes joined the union their employment with plaintiff shall cease; and these respondents deny any knowledge on their part or on the part of any of them that with such understanding plaintiff's employes entered into its employment; and respondents deny any knowledge that such employes are now working for plaintiff under such contract and with such condition. But these respondents deny that because of these conditions, if they do exist, the defendants have not any lawful right to converse with plaintiff's employes as to the advisability or propriety of becoming members of said union, and to use argument and persuasion to induce them of their own will and accord to become members of said union."

Joint and Separate Answer of T. L. Lewis, et al., filed July 13, 1908. (Record, pp. 102, 105, 106.)

"each of said defendants is fully aware that plaintiff is operating a non-union mine and refused consent to operate a union mine, that its men are non-union men; and it may be true that said employes are required by plaintiff at the time of entering its service to agree not to become members of the union while employed, and that if they do join the union their said employment shall cease, but of this respondents deny any knowledge on their part; and it may be true that with such understanding plaintiff's employes entered its employment, and are now working with it under such contract and condition as alleged in said bill, but of which defendants also have no knowledge; but, be this as it may, respondents aver that any condition, stipulation, contract, or agreement on the part of said plaintiff with said employes as a condition upon which they shall enter into and continue their employment with it, are contrary to public policy, are in restraint of that freedom of contract accorded to all citizens of the United States, under and by virtue of its Constitution and the spirit and purpose of its institutions, and cannot be made a condition upon which to base any valid and binding contract or obligation between employer and employe.

Joint and Separate Answer of T. L. Lewis, et al., filed July 13, 1908. (Record, pp. 102, 108.)

"It may be true, and is, as respondent believes, that plaintiff on June 12 did start to run its mine on a non-union basis, and that each and every man who accepted employment at said mine was told at the time of entering plaintiff's employment that there was no union at the mine, that the Company would not allow any, that no union man could remain in the employ of the Company while recognizing and giving paramount allegiance to the union and its orders, and that if any employee of the Company joined the union they could not work any longer for plaintiff. It may be also true that thereupon, with knowledge of said condition of employment, many men applied to plaintiff for work, and entered its employment under an express contract not to join the United Mine Workers of America and to work in its mine, and have so continued to work until the present time, to the satisfaction of themselves and the plaintiff."

Separate Answer of William Green, filed July 13, 1908. (Record, pp. 118, 121.)

"each of said defendants is fully aware that plaintiff is operating a non-union mine and refuses to consent to operate a union mine, that its men are non-union men; and it may be true that said employes are required by plaintiff at the time of entering its service to agree not to become members of the union while employed, and that if they do join the union their said employment shall cease, but of this respondent denies any knowledge on his part; and it may be true that with such understanding plaintiff's employes entered its employment, and are now working with plaintiff under such contract and condition, as alleged in said bill, but of which defendant also has no knowledge; but be this as it may, respondent avers that any condition, stipulation, contract, or agreement on the part of said plaintiff with its said employes as a condition upon which they shall enter into employment and continue their employment with plaintiff are contrary to public policy, are in restraint of that freedom of contract accorded to all citizens of the United States under and by virtue of its Constitution and the spirit and purpose of its institutions, and cannot be made a condition upon which to base any valid and binding contract or obligation between employer and employe."

Separate Answer of William Green, filed July 13, 1908. (Record, pp. 118, 123.)

"It may be true, and is, as respondent believes, that plaintiff on June 12 did start to run its mine on a non-union basis, and that each and every man who accepted employment at said mine was told at the time of entering plaintiff's employment that there was no union at the mine, that the company would now allow any, that no union man could remain in the employ of the Company while recognizing and giving paramount allegiance to the union and its orders, and that if any employes of the company joined the union they could not work any longer for plaintiff."

Separate Answer of D. H. Sullivan, filed July 13, 1908. (Record, pp. 133, 136.)

"each of said defendants is fully aware that plaintiff is operating a non-union mine and refuses to consent to operate a union mine, that its men are non-union men; and it may be true that said employes are required by plaintiff at the time of entering its service to agree not to become members of the union while employed, and that if they do join the union their said employment shall cease, but of this respondent denies any knowledge on his part; and it may be true that with such understanding plaintiff's employes entered its employment, and are now working with plaintiff under such contract and condition, as alleged in said bill, but of which defendant also has no knowledge; but be this as it may, respondent avers that any condition, stipulation, contract or agreement on the part of said plaintiff with its said employes as a condition upon which they shall enter into employment and continue their employment with plaintiff are contrary to public policy, are in restraint of that freedom of contract accorded to all citizens of the United States under and by virtue of its Constitution and the spirit and purpose of its institutions, and cannot be made a condition upon which to base any valid and binding contract or obligation between employer and employe."

Separate Answer of D. H. Sullivan, filed July 13, 1908. (Record, pp. 133, 138, 139.)

"It may be true, and is, as respondent believes, that plaintiff on June 12th did start to run its mine on a non-union basis, and that each and every man who accepted employment at said mine was told at the time of entering plaintiff's employment that there was no union at the mine, that the Company would not allow any, that no union man could remain in the employ of the Company while recognizing and giving paramount allegiance to the union and its orders, and that if any employe of the Company joined the union they could not work any longer for plaintiff. It may be also true that thereupon, with knwoledge of said condition of employment, many men applied to plaintiff for work, and entered its employment under an express contract not to join the United Mine Workers of America and to work in its mine, and have so continued to work until the present time to the satisfaction of themselves and the plaintiff. But this respondent denies any knowledge on his part that the employes of plaintiff were and are required by it at the time of entering its service to agree not to become connected with the union while so employed; and this respondent denies any knowledge on his part that if said employes join the union their employment with plaintiff shall cease; and this respondent denies any knowledge on his part that with such understanding plaintiff's employes entered into its employment; and respondent denies any knowledge that such employes are now working for plaintiff under such contract and with such condition. But this respondent denies that because of these conditions, if they do exist, the defendants have not any lawful right to converse with plaintiff's employes as to the advisability or propriety of becoming members of said union, and to use argument and persuasion to induce them of their own will and accord to become members of said union."

Amended Answer of A. R. Watkins (under oath), filed August 20, 1908. (Record, pp. 150, 153.)

"each of said defendants is fully aware that plaintiff is operating a non-union mine and refuses to consent to operate a union mine, that its men are non-union men; and it may be true that said employes are required by plaintiff at the time of entering its service to agree not to become members of the union while employed, and that if they do join the union their said employment shall cease, but of this respondent denies any knowledge on his part; and it may be true that with such understanding plaintiff's employees entered its employment, and are now working with plaintiff under such contract and condition, as alleged in said bill, but of which defendant also has no knowledge; but be this as it may, respondent avers that any condition, stipulation, contract or agreement on the part of said plaintiff with its said employes as a condition upon which they shall enter into employment and continue their employment with plaintiff are contrary to public policy, are in restraint of that freedom of contract accorded to all citizens of the United States under and by virtue of its Constitution and the spirit and purpose of its institutions, and cannot be made a condition upon which to base any valid and binding contract or obligation between employer and employe."

Amended Answer of A. R. Watkins (under oath) filed August 20, 1908. (Record, pp. 150, 155.)

Respondents admit they made efforts to get plaintiff's men to quit work and to join their union.

Workers, endeavoring to show such employes that it would be better for them and their families, in the prosecution of their vocation as miners, that they become members of said organization."

Respondents say these efforts will be continued when the injunction is out of the way.

Direct examination of D. H. Sullivan. (Record, p. 628, l. 50–53. Record, p. 629, l. 1–11.)
Direct examination of G. W. Savage. (Record, p. 503, l. 34, 35. Record, p. 504, l. 5–9.)

We have made the foregoing extended quotations from the answers which were withdrawn for the purpose of making it evident that the admissions contained were not the result of inadvertence but stated the deliberate purpose and intentional acts of these respondents; and we have directed the attention of the Court to the fact that these answers containing these admissions were before the Court and constituted a part of the case submitted to and decided by Judge Dayton in 1908 in overruling the motion respondents at that time made to modify the injunction so as to give them a free hand.

With the consent of Court, it is, of course, permissible to withdraw pleadings and file new ones. And respondents were permitted to withdraw their pleadings, but under objection from plaintiff were not permitted to take those answers from the files. (Record, pp. 178, 179.)

With the incoming of new answers and the case coming on to be heard upon final hearing, plaintiff introduced in evidence all of these answers which had been withdrawn. (Record, pp. 85–87.)

As a result of the whole matter, petitioner now claims that the admissions made in those answers, which were a part of the Record in the proceedings, whereby respondents' motion to modify the injunction was overruled, became res adjudicata with the dismissal of their appeal by the Circuit Court of Appeals, and that they are estopped and cannot now question their admissions made in that proceeding when those same admissions have been introduced in evidence in the present Record now before this Court.

III.

RESPONDENTS CONTEND THAT PLAINTIFF'S CONTRACTS WITH ITS EMPLOYES ARE IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

And in support of that view cite three West Virginia cases.

The first of these is the case of Slaughter v. Thacker Coal and Coke (1904), 55 W. Va. 642, 47 S. E. 247.

The syllabus of that case is

> "Three coal mining companies operating in the same vein or seam in close proximity to one another, and just having commenced the development of that particular kind of coal, organize indirectly and nominally in the names of individuals a third corporation to act as a general sales agent, and each gives it by contract the exclusive right to sell its entire output of coal at prices uniform as to all three companies, and not to be departed from without the consent of all the companies, and said agent company is to advertise and introduce the coal in the markets, establish and control all agencies and subagencies, and make all sales and collections, and deduct for its compensation 10 cents per ton out of the proceeds of sales. Held, that the contract is illegal and void, its tendency being to suppress competition and restrain trade, contrary to public policy."

This citation by respondents' counsel is wide of the mark, because there is a combination of coal companies. The Hitchman Coal and Coke Company is not in combination with any other coal company. And the contract in question is merely a contract between the Hitchman Company and its own employe. That it makes a separate contract with each employe is not a matter of which these respondents may complain, inasmuch as it is the right of the plaintiff to protect itself against the United Mine Workers of America if it elects to do so.

The second of these cases cited by counsel for respondents is that of Charleston Natural Gas Co. v. Kanawha Natural Gas, Light and Fuel Co., et al. (1905), 58 W. Va. 22, 50 S. E. 876. Counsel's brief (p. 64), in citing this case, says that it decided

> "Courts decline to enforce contracts which impose restraint, though only partial, upon business of such character that such restraint will to any extent repress competition and prejudice the public."

A reference to the case shows that it is not at all applicable for the purpose upon the point on which it is cited, and without further discussion, the points of the syllabus are presented.

> "If two corporations supplying the same community with natural gas make an agreement whereby they parcel out between them the territory, giving to each the exclusive right to sell gas in a given boundary, fixing prices, and prohibiting change of prices except by their mutual consent, binding one company to use for public consumption only gas produced by the other, and prohibiting one from producing from the section of country in which the other produces gas, such agreement tends to monopoly, is void as against public policy, and the courts will not enforce it."
>
> "Courts decline to enforce contracts which impose restraint, though only partial, upon business of such character that such restraint will to any extent repress competition and prejudice the public."
>
> "The common law condemns, as against public policy, agreements between public service corporations of a character to prevent free competition in the interest of the public, and will not enforce them."
>
> "Any agreement between competing public service corporations, the consequence of which is the controlling of prices, limiting of production, or suppressing of competition, so as to create monopoly in things useful to the public, is contrary to public policy and void."

"A combination, the object of which is to obtain sole control of a particular branch of business, is unlawful by common law, against public policy, and all contracts for the accomplishment of this end are void."

"(Syllabus by the Court.)"

The third of these cases is West Virginia Transportation Company v. Ohio River Pipe Line Company, et als. (1883), 22 W. Va. 600. In that case, on page 625, the Court said:

> "From the principles, which underlie all the cases, the inference must be necessarily drawn, that if there be any sort of business, which from its peculiar character, can be restrained to no extent whatever without prejudice to the public interest, then the Courts would be compelled to hold void any contract imposing any restraint, however partial on this peculiar business, provided, of course, it be shown clearly, that the peculiar business thus attempted to be restrained is of such a character that any restraint upon it, however partial, must be regarded by the Court as prejudicial to the public interest."

It cannot be contended under that authority that it is contrary to the public interest for the Hitchman Company to contract with its own employes that they will not join the United Mine Workers of America while they are employed by the Hitchman Company; nor is it contrary to the public interest for the Hitchman Company to agree that it will run its mine non-union while they are in its employ; but that authority is to the point upon the proposition that respondents and their organization in their endeavor to control the coal mining industry in this country have given to their occupation a public interest, and for that reason in seeking to control the coal mining industry of this country they are acting in restraint of trade.

> "A restraint reasonably necessary for the protection of the covenantee must prevail unless some specific ground of public policy can be clearly established against it. (Underwood (E.) & Son, Ltd. v. Barker, [1899] 1 Ch. 300 C. A.)
>
> "Trade and Trade Unions" 27 Laws of England, Halsbury, p. 549, Note (g).

IV.

PREVIOUS KNOWLEDGE IS NOT IMPORTANT; BUT PRESENT KNOWLEDGE OF THE CONTRACT CANNOT BE DENIED.

It does not matter even if respondents did not know about petitioner's contracts with its employes when they filed their last answers September 5, 1910; they learned about them when the case was tried in December, 1910; they have had such knowledge ever since and they know about the contracts now.

The English case of De Francesco v. Barnum, decided by the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, makes this plain:

> "The plaintiff in May, 1889, entered into agreements with five girls whereby they agreed to perform in the ballet for the plaintiff during the following pantomime season at certain salaries. In October, 1889, B who had at that time no notice of these agreements, engaged the same girls to perform under his directions. The plaintiff, on discovering this engagement, gave notice to B of the agreements of May, 1889, but notwithstanding this the girls continued to be employed by B. The plaintiff sued B for damages for continuing to employ the girls after notice of the agreements of May, 1889, and the girls for breach of these agreements.

"Held (following Blake v. Lanyon, 6 T. R. 221) that an action will lie against one who continues to employ the servant of another after notice of the prior contract of service, and, that in order to maintain such an action it is not necessary that the employer and employed should stand in the strict relation of master and servant."

An appeal from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit,

The Index of the Original Brief appears at the end thereof at pages 207-209.

As appeal No. 241 was taken on the theory that the case involved a Federal question, the parts of the original brief relating thereto can no longer serve any practical purpose, inasmuch as the appeal was dismissed on the ground that the record presents no such question.

The obsolete portions of the Original Brief appear therein at pages 8-12, 149-151, 153, 155.

WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT.

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF ON THE MERITS.

I

STATEMENT.

This case is now before the court on a writ of certiorari, the record on the appeal thereof from the Fourth Circuit heretofore dismissed for want of jurisdiction, to be treated as the return thereto.

All questions properly before the court below may be considered and determined by this court inasmuch as the record of the appeal is now before us as the return to said writ.

The Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, upon whose application the writ was awarded, makes a statement extending from page 2 to 42 of the petition, while Rule

37 of this court provides "The petition shall contain only a summary and short statement of the matter involved."

Wherever the word "petition" occurs in this brief reference is made to the petition accompanying the application for a writ of certiorari.

We cannot ignore the matters set out in the petition, lest where it purports (a) to contain certain facts it might be inferred that respondents concede their truth for the purposes of this case; (b) or that certain other facts were properly in the record for consideration by this court in its review of the decree complained of, (c) or where the law is announced, referred to or quoted, its soundness and applicability admitted. We, therefore, respectfully ask the court to follow us in our

in order that we may have a just conception of this case as presented by the whole record.

The averment taken from the bill (petition, p. 2) is positively denied by the answer (record, pp. 66, 67) and not estabilshed by the proof.

The conclusion of the learned District Judge, who decided this case in the first instance, that the United Mine Workers of America is an unlawful labor union is set out in the petition. (Pages 3 and 4).

On page 4 this conclusion is based upon the declaration of the learned judge that this organization "has by express contract joined in a combination and conspiracy with a body of rival operators, resident in other states, to control, restrain, and, to an extent, at least, destroy the coal trade of the State of West Virginia."

There is not a single averment in the bill charging the respondents with any combination or conspiracy with coal operators in other states. The pleadings nowhere raise such an issue. Evidence as to such a matter is wholly foreign to the case.

It is, therefore, submitted that the cases of Clune v. United States, 159 U. S. 590, 40 L. ed. 269, and Loewe

v. Lawlor, 208 U. S. 274, (petition, p. 4) cited by the District Judge have no application to this case.

On pages 6 and 7, appear excerpts from the opinion of the District Court dealing with this labor union as engaged in a conspiracy with coal operators and producers in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Illinois and Indiana in restraint of trade and commerce, a matter, as just stated, upon which the pleadings are absolutely silent, and in this connection Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106 (petition, p. 5), and Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161 (p. 6) are cited and relied upon, but cannot be used in support of a case foreign to the one not made by the bill and answers.

The petition (pp. 12-14) presents argument in an effort to show that juridiction of a Federal Court in this case does not depend solely on diverse citizenship, but also involves a Federal question. The dismissal of the appeal in this case on motion of appellees because the only ground of jurisdiction being the diverse citizenship of the parties, the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals was final, necessarily renders this part of the petition (pp. 12-14) immaterial and inconsequent

It is futher stated (petition p. 16) that the material allegations of the bill have been abundantly sustained and there is no controversy over the facts.

The truth of this statement is not supported by the record, and is therefore denied.

All the documentary evidence referred to in the petition (pp. 17, 18) offered by the petitioner was objected to as irrelevant, except the constitutions of the United Mine Workers.

The objections are contained in the exceptions of respondents to certain parts of the evidence appearing in the record of appeal, pp. 222-229.

It is also stated (p. 20) that some of the rules and regulations of the United Mine Workers are lawful "and some unlawful, but pregnant with unmeasured and unmeasurable abuse of unlimited and unregulated power."

It is by respondents denied that the clause in quotations presents the truth with reference to any of the rules and regulations of the United Mine Workers of America It is insisted that they are all lawful.

It is further stated that this labor organization "is a secret body." This is not supported by the record and positively denied by respondents.

The statement (pp. 20-24) in the petition as to an agreement between this union and the operators of other states, as we have seen, is foreign to the case, and will, therefore not be considered by this court.

A statement appears in the petition (p. 24) that "although the United Mine Workers as an organization have to date waged an industrial war against the non-union fields the Union operators still complain of the competition from those fields and urge the mine workers to greater efforts along the same line, and to other and more desperate and unlawful acts."

This conclusion is drawn by counsel for the petitioner from the irrelevant evidence admitted into the case over respondent's objection, in an attempt to prove a conspiracy between respondents and coal operators (not named or identified) resident in States outside of West Virginia, and in the absence of anything in the pleadings making such evidence relevant.

Certain parts of the Constitution of the International Union are set out in the petition (pp. 26, 27) and other portions thereof at pages 28, 29.

The matter relating to Joint Conventions (p. 29) is entirely foreign to this case, and evidence bearing on this was introduced at the trial with nothing in the pleadings making such evidence admissable, and went in under objections.

There are certain practices imputed to the United Mine Workers in the petition beginning at the bottom of page 29 and continuing to the end of page 30, many of which are not made issuable by anything in the bill or answers, some of which are improperly stated and others have no foundation in fact.

Noticing these so-called "practices", beginning with the one of "driving operators out of business who incur their displeasure by means of strikes", it is at this point, sufficient to say that this charge is not true, as stated in the petition, and in fact is not sustained by the proof.

Another practice charged (petition, p. 30) is that "They (United Mine Workers) have sent out men to the trade to boycott West Virginia Coal."

There is nothing of this sort charged against the respondents, and we recall no evidence bearing out such a practice as here charged. Furthermore, it is not material whether such a practice does exist, unless directed against the petitioner to the detriment of its business.

Another practice charged (p. 30) is

"They" (United Mine Workers) "engage in politics and maintain lobbies for the purpose of affecting legislation."

This charge is made from a distorted construction of the language used in the preamble to the constitution of the union, expressive in parts of its purposes set forth in paragraphs Fifth-Tenth appearing in our ORIGINAL BRIEF ON THE MERITS at pages 94, 95. A proper construction of these paragraphs justify no such charge.

A further charge is that "They" (United Mine Workers) "put operators at a disadvantage who refuse to go into the Joint Interstate Movement."

> "They compelled operators in the southwest territory to join the operators' association by refusing to allow their members to work for operators who did not join that operators' association upon that association agreeing not to employ any man who was not a member of the United Mine Workers of America."

There is no allegation in any of the pleadings in the cause justifying such a charge. The issues raised by the pleadings in this case appear in a subsequent part of this brief at pages 23-24 and also in our Original Brief on the Merits at page 7.

It is charged in the petition (p. 30) that "They" (United Mine Workers) "have constantly aimed to involve West Virginia and other non-union fields in local or national strikes; and that is their aim today."

There is nothing properly in this case authorizing this statement.

There is no allegation in the pleadings imputing to respondents that they or any of them were endeavoring to involve petitioner's men in a strike since it began to run its mine non-union.

There is an allegation in the bill (record, p. 18) imputing the use of language to respondents Lewis and Mitchell, in one of the annual conventions of the union that organization would be effected by a strike movement. And the answer to this part of the bill (record, p. 61) sets forth that the language used by said Lewis and Mitchell > "was simply a tentative presentation of the situation that then confronted the organization, and did not have for its object the disturbance of plaintiff's mines or the men employed thereat, nor had it anything whatever to do with the plaintiff's business."

It is a sufficient answer to this to state that none of the respondents are charged with the causing of any strike movement affecting the non-union portion of West Virginia, nor the mine of the petitioner. Petitioner does not complain in its bill of any strike or movement to accomplish that end.

> It is further charged in the petition (p. 30) that "Through their president, the defendant Mitchell, they threatened to stop every mine in the Pittsburgh district by filling them with organizers, if necessary, in order to compel compliance with their wishes. Mitchell boasted of this."

It is further charged in the petition (p. 30) that "they are constantly aiming to increase the cost of the West Virginia operators' coal through organizers and secret agents sent out to stir up strife."

This is not averred in the pleadings and is without evidence to support it. It is quite unreasonable and highly improbable that this organization could accomplish such a thing as here charged, as this could only be brought about by an increase in the price paid for mining the coal, and it is in evidence that petitioner pays his miners as much as the union scale provides.

The recital in the petition (pp. 31-35) of matters occurring prior to June 12, 1906, the day upon which petitioner began to run its mine non-union, are foreign to the issues in this case, and will, therefore, not be considered by the court.

The recital in the petition (pp. 37, 38) as to the Joint Interstate Movement is foreign to this case.

There is no allegation whatever in the bill touching this statement in the petition, and no proof along this line can be received.

It is also averred in the petition (p. 39) that at the annual convention of Sub-District 5 of District No. 6, held in March, 1907, the following resolution was passed:

"Whereas, There are mines in the Panhandle District and Ohio that are not organized, and believing every mine should be organized, be it

"Resolved, By this Ninth Annual Convention that the Sub-District officers together with the District officers, be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the Sub-District as quickly as it can be done."

It is admitted that the Hitchman mine is in Sub-District five, and that it is one of the mines referred to in the resolution.

The act of adopting this resolution does not support, or even tend to support, the contention of the petitioner made in its bill of complaint. The allegation of the bill as to unionizing petitioner's mine is in this language:

> "Your orator further says that in effecting their said object of unionizing your orator's mine the said defendants propose and threaten to, and your orator being so informed and believing it to be true, alleges on such information and belief that said defendants will and are about to, indulge in all of the many methods of accomplishing their result by the use of threats, intimidation, force, violent or abusive language, picketing your orator's premises, picketing or patrolling or guarding the streets and approaches to your orator's premises and going to the homes or boarding houses of your orator's employees for the purpose of intimidating or coercing them to leave your orator's employment and to picket railroad and street cars passing to and from or through your orator's premises for the purpose of intercepting your orator's employees in going to or from your orator's premises and for the purpose of intercepting and preventing persons coming to your orator's premises for the purpose of seeking or for the purpose of entering into your orator's employment."
> (Record, p. 27).

This allegation is denied in terms most direct and positive in the answer. (Record, pp. 67, 83).

The allegation her quoted and also set out in the petition (p. 2) is indeed the gravamen of the bill of complaint.

The court knows from the record that no coal mine can be organized and thus placed on a union basis, without the consent of the operator. (Record, pp. 496, 500, 568, 570, 624, 625).. To unionize a mine there must be a written contract between the operator of the one part and the miners by their representative or committee of the other part. The contract is necessarily voluntary, bilateral, and as to the miners, collective. That is, the miners working in each plant contract as a body and not idividually each for himself. The terms are all defined and operate upon all the employes alike.

A further statement appears in the petition (p. 40) that

"reports were put in circulation by the Union's officials that the mine was going to be unionized, and that unless the men joined the United Mine Workers they would soon be out of their jobs."

This statement is moulded from an allegation made in the bill (record, p. 22) imputing the circulation of such a report to respondent John Zelenka, which is fully and positively denied by the answer. (Record, pp. 63, 78, 79) and not sustained by the evidence.

It is charged (petition p. 41) that "many miners were deterred from taking employment" with petitioner.

This statement is absolutely untrue and wholly without support by the record.

As to the statement in the petition (p. 41) as to what was done by Hughes at the Glendale and Richland mines—mines not owned by the petitioner—it is a sufficient answer to say that the former is owned by the Glendale Coal Company, a corporation, which has also filed a bill against respondents to which answers have been filed in which is denied, in direct and positive terms, the statement that Hughes succeeded in having twenty-two men join the Union and quit work at the Glendale mine. The proof of petitioner does not show that Hughes induced the men to quit, but on the contrary they were actually discharged by the Glendale Coal Company because they joined the United Mine Workers. (Record, pp. 306, 310, 312, 313).

It will be shown upon the trial of the Glendale case, that the statement as to these twenty-two men has no foundation in fact, but that they actually came to Hughes and solicited membership in the Union, that they were then received into the Union by him, and for this alone these men were discharged by the Glendale Company. The record falls short of any proof to show that Hughes did a thing toward getting these men to quit work at the Glendale Coal Company's mine.

(Record, pp. 312, 313).

On re-direct examination this witness is specially interrogated by counsel for petitioner as to this matter, and testifies as follows:

"Q. In your direct examination, I understood you to say that Hughes had gotten a number of men to quit work at the Glendale mine? ,

Mr. Hogg: He didn't say that; he said they were discharged.

Mr. Gilchrist No; he didn't say that.

The Court:

Q. How was that? Had Hughes gotten any number of men to quit at the Glendale and Hitchman mines?

A. Well, it was brought about by Mr. Hughes, I think. There was a meeting of the men the night before this near the B. & O. station of Glendale.

Q Did any of them quit work?

A. Well, they way it came about was this: The men were at the meeting the night before near the B. & O. station at Glendale, and Mr. Hughes was present talking to them down at the B. & O. station, and I got the names of five of the men who were at this meeting and I instructed the mine foreman to have these men remain on the outside of the mine the next morning until we could have a talk—I mean with these five particular men—and when the mine foreman told these men to remain on the outside of the mine—that we wanted to see them and have a talk with them—why, there was fifteen others (there was twenty altogether)

—there was fifteen others who said they would stay out and see what we wanted. I was not present just exactly at this time but I was immediately after, and when I came up to these men they were sitting there on a pile of mine props and I told them, I says. 'From your actions last night and also this morning it seems to me as though you want to become members of the United Mine Workers,' and I says,

'You understand that you cannot become members of the United Mine Workers and work for the Glendale Coal Company, but', I says, 'we haven't any objections or we are not trying to hinder you from becoming members of the United Mine Workers of America, but you understand that you cannot be members of the United Mine Workers and work for the Glendale Company; and one of the number—I do not remember exactly which one—says, 'Well, I suppose that means for us to get our tools out?' And I told him that was exactly what it meant, and I also told them as soon as their tools were outside of the mine their money would be ready for them.'

(Record, pp. 312, 313).

This certainly overthrows any foundation for the statement that Hughes succeeded in having twenty men to quit work at the Glendale mine.

The petition states (p. 41) that > "At the Hitchman mine, Hughes, according to his statements, succeeded in having enough men agree to join the Union to enable him to unionize the mine, and he was about ready to shut it down, which he also stated he would do, if the management did not recognize the Union."

This statement is predicated upon an allegation of the bill of complaint made in the following language:

> "And your orator says that while the said defendants have so far been unable to bring about or induce your orator's employees to quit its service, still the said Hughes has recently stated to one of your orator's miners whom he was trying to induce to leave your orator's service and join the Union, that he, Hughes, had succeeded in having one hundred and twenty-five men at the Hitchman mine sign their names agreeing to become members of the United Mine Workers of America and that just as soon as he got twenty-five more names he was going to shut the Hitchman mine down."

(Record, p. 25).

This allegation is denied by the answers in direct and positive terms.

(Record, pp. 65, 80, 81).

And the answer denies that Hughes had any authority from the United Mine Workers or any organization connected therewith to do anything to induce the petitioner's employees to cease working for petitioner.

(Record, p. 80).

The evidence simply shows an idle declaration of Lee Rankin, who ceased to be a member of the Union several years ago, and an idle statement and vain boast of Hughes, who has not been brought before the court by process and who has in no manner made his appearance to this cause as to whom the suit ought to have been dismissed.

The testimony of petitioner as to this feature of the case appears in the record at pp. 414, 415, 429, 432, 470.

The pages of the record just referred to contain all the evidence as to this matter out of the twenty-odd witnesses introduced by petitioner, and this consists of an empty declaration of a person who for several years has not been a member of the Union and another person who was never brought before the court.

Will the Court hold all the officers and members of this labor organization responsible upon an idle declaration or vain boast, made on one or two occasions, of in intention to do a thing which neither of the persons making it could possibly do, and which neither had any authority to do for the United Mine Workers as an organization?

On this point the learned Circuit Court of Appeals in its opinion in this case (214 Fed. at pp. 708, 709) said:

> "Paul Leonard, superintendent of the Richland mine, was introduced, and among other things testified that he had met a man by the name of Thomas Hughes on the Richland Coal Company's property, and had had a talk with him in regard to the organization; that Hughes told him that it was his purpose to orgainze the Panhandle District of West Virginia. Among other things, the counsel put the following question to him:
>
> 'Q. What did you understand him to say his meaning was when he said that he was there to organize the Panhandle District?
>
> A. Why, that he would make them join the United Mine Workers or tie them up, were the words he used to me."

Counsel also asked him the following question:

> 'Q. Did he (meaning Mr. Hughes) make any explanation as to what he meant by tying up the Panhandle?
>
> A. That they would organize us and we would recognize the Union.'

The witness further says:

> 'My understanding of it was that if the company did not recognize this union that the mines would be shut down.'
>
> This was a threat by one who was without power to execute same. Nowhere do we find any evidence tending to show that Hughes was authorized to shut down any of the mines of that vicinity. It should also be remembered that Leonard further testified that Hughes said nothing about plaintiff's mine.'

And in the same case (p. 712) the court further said:

> "The declarations of Hughes and Rankin > are incompetent as against the organization, its officers and members, inasmuch as there is not sufficient legal evidence to establish the fact that the defendants as members of the United Mine Workers of America prior to and at the time of the institution of this suit formed a conspiracy; nor is there sufficient evidence to show that Rankin and Hughes were parties to such alleged conspiracy."

The petition further states (p. 42) that > "At the Hitchman mine so great had been the disturbance created by the attempt to organize the men there that with the number the company could safely employ it was unable to fulfill its contracts for delivery of coal for the lake trade from its mine, and from ten to fifteen thousand tons of coal had to be bought elsewhere."

This statement in the petition does not comport with the following allegation made by the petitioner in its own bill of complaint:

> "After your orator started up non-union June 12th, 1906 * * * * despite their efforts, your orator was able to increase the number of its employees and to increase its business which is conducted successfully and peacefully and lawfully from that time until the present."
> (Record, pp. 21, 22).

The answers of respondents to this part of the bill is in this language:

> "And these respondents admit that plaintiff was able to increase the number of its employees and to increase its business, which it has conducted successfully and peacefully and lawfully from the time it started non-union to the present, but deny that this was done despite any efforts or acts of interference with the plaintiff's business on the part of these defendants or any of them."

Nor does the above quoted statement contained in the petition comport with petitioner's own evidence. Its president, Edward T. Hitchman, in his direct examination was asked this question:

"How much time, if any has your company lost by reason of labor troubles since resuming work non-union in June, 1906?"

The witness replied: "None at all."

(Record, p. 254).

The petitioner ceased to run union on March 31, 1906, which was the end of the first quarter for that year and the output for that quarter was,—engine coal, 45,843.95 tons; commercial coal, 33,885.70 tons.

On June 12, 1906, the petitioner resumed its work of mining on a non-union basis, and on June 20th, 1906, the end of the second quarter, the output, engine coal was 21,249.10 tons, commercial coal 2,519.55 tons. The light tonnage is due to the fact that the mine only ran a very short time; for the third quarter ending September 30th, 1906, the output was 47,240.70 tons of engine coal, and commercial coal, 34,288.90 tons; for the fourth quarter ending December 31st, 1906, engine coal 52,909.70 tons, and commercial coal 45,638.15 tons, making a total of engine and commercial coal for the year 1906 of 285,557.75 tons.

(Record, p. 261).

The court's attention is respectfully directed to the report of the tonnage at the end of each quarter for the year 1907, disclosing an enormously large output for the third quarter ending September 30th, of that year.

These extraordinary large outputs relate to the period when it is claimed by the petitioner that its employees and mine operations were disturbed by the respondents.

The bill in this case was filed on October 24, 1907, and on that day a temporary restraining order was granted and on May 26, 1908, a temporary injunction was issued.

(Record, pp. 1, 41, 42).

As shown by the record (p. 261) among the largest tonnages of coal produced before or since the institution of this suit was during the quarter ending September 30th, 1907, just about three weeks prior to the issuance of the restraining order, which was engine coal 52,277.65 tons and commercial coal 39,662.05 tons.

Examine the total tonnage per year beginning with that of 1903, the first year petitioner began to run its mine as a union mine, and you will find in that year it was 130,281 tons; in the year 1904 it was 208,820.85 tons; in the year 1905 it was 266,341.65.

During these years it operated as a union mine, except during the first quarter of the year 1903, and the total tonnage for these three years was 605,443.50 tons.

Now, take the first five years it ran non-union. For the year 1906 the tonnage was 285,557.75; for the year 1907 it was 339,575.70; for the year 1908 it was 143,653.20; in the year 1909 it was 217,775.00; for the year 1910 it was 281, 559.20 tons.

The record discloses that there was an annual increase in the product of the mine from 1902 when it started up until and including the year 1907, when the output exceeded any other year.

In the year 1907 the output was 339,575.70 tons, and this is the year in which it is claimed and alleged by petitioner that the respondents' threatened to disturb its mining operations, and in which the suit was brought and in which the temporary restraining order was made, and the year to which all the admissible evidence relates.

Now, notice the increase in the product of the mine from year to year, beginning with 1903,

When the Mine Was Run as a Union Mine.

The increase of 1904 over the product of 1903 was 78,539.85 tons; of 1905 over 1904 was 57,520.90 tons.

We have admitted the tonnage for 1902, when the mine was run non-union because the mine did not run the full year.

Now notice the annual increase in the product during the time

When the Mine Was Run as a Non-Union Mine.

The increase of 1906, the first quarter of which was run union, over 1905 was 19,216.10 tons; of 1907 over 1906 was 54,017.95 tons; in the year 1908 the product was 195,922.50 tons less than in 1907, and 122,688.45 tons less than in 1906, the last year the mine was run union; the product for the year 1909 was 121,800.70 tons less than in 1907, and 48,566.65 tons less than in 1906, the last union year; but an increase of 74,121.80 over 1908; the increase in the product of the year 1910 over the year 1909 was 73,784.20 tons.

(Record, pp. 260, 261).

The production of the mine for the years 1906 and 1907 conclusively demonstrates that respondents did not interfere with the continuous and successful operation of petitioner's mine.

How could petitioner have produced a total output in the year 1906 of 285,557.75 tons, and in the year 1907 a total of 339,575.70 tons, more than in any other year of its history, from 1902 to the present time, if during these two years of 1906 and 1907 the respondents were all that time interfering with petitioner's employees and intermeddling in the operation of its mine?

The injunction (of a most sweeping and drastic character) went into effect on October 24, 1907, in the form of a restraining order and has ever since been in effect.

Do not these facts as to the tonnage of the mine in 1906 and 1907 clearly and satisfactorily convince us that the respondents did not in any manner disturb or interfere with the petitioner in the management, control, or operation of its mine during the entire period of time complained of?

II.

EVIDENCE IMPROPERLY INTRODUCED INTO THE RECORD BY THE PETITIONER.

Before entering upon the discussion of the merits of this case, we desire to purge the record of a great deal of incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant evidence.

All the testimony was received by the court subject to exceptions to be taken and passed upon at the final hearing.

(Record, pp. 480, 481).

Accordingly the respondents served with process to answer the bill, and who appeared and answered, submitted their exceptions in writing to all evidence, documentary and oral, which they regarded as improper.

These exceptions appear in the record (pp. 222-247) and each exception sets forth the ground therefor.

Although the learned Judge of the District Court based his decree, in part, upon this improper evidence, and while we have no apprehension that this Court will give this evidence any consideration in reaching its conclusion upon the case presented by the record, we direct attention to the parts of the record in which the objectionable evidence is found, merely for the convenience of the Court, thus enabling it more readily to examine those parts of the record wherein is found the testimony bearing on the issues between the parties.

Of course, we concede that the admission of improper evidence into a cause tried by the Court without a jury, as in this case (in equity), is no ground for reversal. The controlling inquiry here is whether there is sufficient competent evidence in the record to sustain the decree of the District Court, the same question that was before the Circuit Court of Appeals and was by that court determined against the petitioner.

Richardson vs. Doty, 25 Neb. 424, 41 N. W. 282.

Ward vs. Parlin, 30 Neb. 376, 46 N. W. 529.

Certain portions of this improper testimony appear in the printed record, and the other parts consist of original documents transmitted to this court under an order duly entered in the cause directing their transmission here.

The Improper Evidence Contained in the Record relates to matters occurring with reference to the operation of petitioner's mine before it began to carry on its mining business upon a non-union basis, and some other matters to be subsequently noted in this part of the brief.

The petitioner began to operate its mine non-union on June 12th, 1906, (record, p. 5) and the conspiracy is alleged to have been formed and other wrongful acts done and imputed to respondents by petitioner's bill of complaint, after it decided to resume its mining operations on a non-union basis.

Therefore, the alleged conspiracy and other alleged wrongs imputed to respondents occuring after June 12th, 1906, may be properly treated as evidence, if occuring prior to the institution of the suit, but any and all matters relating to respondents or any of them as members of this Labor Union shown to have occurred prior to June 12th, 1906, is necessarily immaterial and irrelevant, and only encumber the record and confuse us in our examination of the evidence.

That these matters occurring prior to June 12th 1906, are immaterial and have no bearing on the question whether or not respondents formed a conspiracy to "unioize" petitioner's mine is quite obvious upon reason and authority.

Commonwealth vs. Meserve, 154 Mass. 64, 27 N. E. 997.

The parts of the printed record in which this immaterial evidence occurs appear on the following pages thereof: 250-4, 255-6, 258, 266, 268-9, 273, 275-9, 282-5, 287-9, 298-304, 308, 313-330, 331-333, 343-356, 358-61, 369, 375-82, 383-7, 443-51, 455-8, 462-6, 467, 468.

The irrelevant evidence consists in large part of documents, many of which are referred to in "Plaintiff's Index", containing 453 pages. This "Index" relating to this class of evidence begins at page 114 and extends to page 142, and beginning with this page and extending to the end of the volume appear excerpts taken from these documents.

This immaterial evidence is made the subject of respondents exceptions as shown by the record (239-240, statement of issues involved in the case), Numbers LXXII-CXIV (pp. 240-246).

There is considerable immaterial or irrelevant evidence brought into the record on the cross-examination of respondents' witnesses, (Record, pp. 502-5, 542-3, 545-8, 550-4, 560-3, 565, 576-580, 582-5, 596-617), and went in under exceptions.

A great deal of this evidence relates to matters entirely foreign to any issue between the parties raised by the pleadings, other parts of it relate to various isolated matters occurring long after the institution of this suit, and at different points in the United States, and in no wise bear upon the issue and none of it has any tendency to throw light upon any question properly arising in the cause, as an examination of the parts of the record here referred to clearly discloses.

III.

GRAVAMEN OF THE BILL AND ISSUES INVOLVED IN THE CASE.

A careful examination of the record (pp. 2–31) discloses that the Gravamen of Petitioner's Bill of Complaint consists of the charges concisely stated that the > United Mine Workers of America and its subordinate associations by its officers, agents, employees and servants have sought and are now seeking by enticement, threats, and intimidation, but so far without physical violence, (a) to cause petitioner's employees to leave its service and to cause others who have engaged to enter its service to break their engagement and not work for petitioner, (record, p. 5) that (b) the United Mine Workers and its subordinate associations is an unlawful organization with certain expressed objects, some lawful and others unlawful, as indicated by certain excerpts from its constitution (record, p. 6–15); that (c) the respondents have combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy under the name of The United Mine Workers of America to unlawfully persuade, entice, and procure petitioner's mine workers to break, violate, and disregard their several contracts with petitioner, (d) for the avowed purpose of compelling it to unionize its plant and (e) have formed a conspiracy to compel by threats and intimi> dation petitioner's employees to join the Union (record, pp. 15, 16); (f) that the United Mine Workers of America as an organization or association are in their constitution violating the common and statutory laws of the State of West Virginia, as well as the constitution of said State (record, p. 25); that (g) unless enjoined from so doing the respondents acting individually and as conspirators under the name of the United Mine Workers of America will by inducement, persuasion, or coercion in some form or other shut down the petitioner's mine, compel it to recognize the Union in the transaction of its business and compel petitioner to carry on its business in such a manner as respondents dictate. (Record, pp. 26, 27).

The gravamen of the bill, as above set forth, is taken from allegations of a most general nature, unaccompanied by any averment of time, place or circumstances.

The allegations upon which the statement as the gravamen of the petitioner's complaint is predicated, as shown by the record (pp. 5, 6, 15, 16, 25, 26, 27), seem to us scarcely to constitute allegations of facts, but appear to be more in the nature of conclusions of law or conclusions of fact.

The only overt distinct acts alleged in petitioner's bill of complaint that may properly be considered issuable facts are those appearing in the record (pp. 17-20, 22, 23, 25), and it is assumed that these specific averments of facts are to be taken and read in connection with the general allegations of the bill imputing to the respondents the charges therein made against them.

It will be noted that wherever anything clearly and properly of an unlawful character is alleged against the respondents that it is denied by their answers appearing in the record at pp. 53-84.

In the consideration of the petitioner's bill of complaint we will first discuss the various matters above set forth in the gravamen thereof, and we will then bring to the Court's attention the alleged specific unlawful acts imputed to a part of the respondents as they appear in the record and which are positively denied by the answers.

A proper and orderly argument of this case makes it necessary that the issues between the parties be clearly defined and must be determined alone by the pleadings therein; that is, all material facts averred in the bill and denied by answer necessarily create the controversy now before the Court for its determination.

In our Original Brief on the Merits (p. 7), we have submitted four separate matters as our conception of these issues based upon the record.

In this Supplemental Brief, for the convenience of the Court, we have enlarged upon our statement of these issues by rearrangemtnt thereof, as shown by the alphabetical order contained in our statement of the matters constituting the gravamen of the petitioner's bill of complaint; and the following are the issues as thus extended:

(a)

Whether or not The United Mine Workers of America by their representatives have sought and are now seeking by enticement, threats, and intimidation, but so far without physical violence, to cause petitioner's employees to leave its service and to cause others who have engaged to enter its service to break their engagements and not work for petitioner.

(b)

Whether or not the United Mine Workers of America and its subordinate associations is in any of its expressed objects unlawful as indicated by any parts of its constitution or preamble thereto.

(c)

Whether or not the respondents have combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy under the name of The United Mine Workers of America to unlawfully persuade, entice, and procure petitioner's mine workers to break, violate, and disregard their several contracts with petitioner.

(d)

Whether or not the respondents at the time of the institution of this suit and after petitioner began to run its mine non-union in June, 1906, were engaged in a conspiracy to compel the petitioner to unionize its plant against its own wish or desire.

(e)

Whether or not the respondents at the time of the institution of this suit had formed a conspiracy to compel by threats and intimidation petitioner's employees to join the United Mine Workers of America.

(f)

Whether or not the United Mine Workers of America as an organization or association are in their constitution violating the common and statutory laws of the State of West Virginia as well as the constitution of said State.

(g)

Whether or not, unless enjoined from so doing, the respondents acting individually and as conspirators under the name of The United Mine Workers of America will by inducement, persuasion, and coercion in some form or other, shut down the petitioner's mine, compel it to recognize the union in the transaction of its business and compel petitioner to carry on its business in such manner as the respondents may dictate.

The Court's attention is respectfully directed to the evidence in this case properly applicable to the issues raised therein. We have particularly pointed out in this supplemental brief (ante pp. 18-a, 18-d), in addition to what has already been stated in our Original Brief on the Merits, that there is quite a volume of evidence entirely foreign to any issue raised by the pleadings in this cause. We emphasize the statement that the issues as here defined are all-comprehensive, and a critical examination of the bill and answer thereto discloses that every issue between the parties is comprehended in the statement above made thereof.

It is perhaps needless to remind the Court that as stated in the bill (record, pp. 4, 24), and as shown by the evidence of the petitioner (record, pp. 255, 256, 273) the petitioner ran its mine non-union from April 1, 1903, until April 1, 1906; or that any acts or conduct imputable to the respondents bearing upon the issues between the parties must relate to the period subsequent to the time that petitioner started to run its mine non-union which was on June 12, 1906, to the time of the institution of this suit which was October 24, 1907.

IV.

ARGUMENT.

The United Mine Workers of America by their representatives or otherwise have not sought and are not now seeking by enticement, threats, and intimidation to cause petitioner's employees to leave its service and to cause others who have engaged to enter its service to break their engagements and not to work for petitioner.

The attempt of the petitioner to prove the affirmative of this issue (a) was wholly futile. The attention of the Court is respectfully directed as to these phases of the case to our Original Brief on the Merits, beginning with the last paragraph on page 33 and ending with the second paragraph thereafter on page 34.

The only part of the record in any wise whatsoever having even a tendency to bear on this issue is that which appears in the testimony of the witness, E. C. Pickett, the superintendent of the Hitchman and Glendale Mines, (record, pp. 310, 312, 313), and the pertinent part of this witness's evidence has already been set out in this supplemental brief, (pp. 10, 11).

It will be observed from this testimony that the respondents did not entice the employees of the petitioner to quit work, nor did they entice any of the employees of the Glendale Coal Company to quit work, but that certain of the employees of the Glendale Coal Company were discharged by its superintendent or quit the employment of that company on their own account because they desired to become members of this Labor Organization.

But counsel for the petitioner in a strenuous effort to make out a case against these respondents states that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, a corporation, and the Glendale Coal Company, another and different corporation, under the same management, was treated by the petitioner as one concern and the petitioner's bill alleges this fact; (record, p. 21), and the bill also alleges that these respondents and each of them treated the two mines as a single concern, (record, p. 21), which is denied by the answer of respondents wherein they say that "they deny that said defendants and each of them treated the two mines as a single concern and have so dealt with plaintiff as in said bill is alleged." (Record, p. 61). There is no proof whatever that these two mines were treated by these respondents as a single concern. But, suppose that the petitioner did treat the two mines as a single concern? Would this allow the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, a separate and distinct person from the Glendale Coal Company, to make complaint in this suit for any wrong sustained by the Glendale Coal Company or for any injury suffered by it from acts imputable to the respondents, even if such acts had been proved? To ask this question is to answer it in the negative. It is elementary law that a court will not entertain a complaint for the redress of grievances not suffered by the plaintiff himself.

(b)

The United Mine Workers of America and its subordinate associations, is not in any of its expressed objects unlawful as indicated by any parts of its constitution or preamble thereto.

The legality of this Labor Union must be determined by the objects or purposes of the organization.

IN OUR ORIGINAL BRIEF ON THE MERITS, (p. 35), we have stated the general purpose of this organization which is fully supported by the record.

In addition to what is there set forth, we especially note what is stated in the answer (record, pp. 67, 83) relating to this feature of the organization wherein it is averred that > its object is to protect labor and promote its welfare by securing, if possible, through lawful methods higher wages, shorter hours, and better conditions at the mines for the safety and health of the employees, and in various other lawful methods aid the coal miner in the prosecution of his employment, and provide the necessaries of life for himself and family, and thus make him a more useful factor in society as a citizen of the state.

And also, as stated by one of the witnesses for petitioner (record, pp. 362, 363) who formerly belonged to this Labor Union, > to equalize the opportunities among the miners and not discriminate in favor of one as against another where the conditions are the same.

And further, as stated by the President of the United Mine Workers (record, pp. 574, 575), > to raise the standard of wages to such a point that it will provide the miners and their families not only with the necessaries but with some of the comforts of life, to reduce the > hours of labor to that point where they are not required to work any longer than necessary to produce all the coal that will meet the requirements of the nation, and to improve the working conditions of the men in the mines to the highest possible standard that artificial means can make those coditions good; to educate the Mine Workers in order that they may understand their own wants and requirements, so that they will know how to secure what belongs to them, by intelligent methods, and to do everything that will make of them better citizens and help, of course, to make of the nation a better nation of people.

And in this connection the Court's attention is directed to what is further stated by the President of the organization in answer to a question appearing in the record (p. 574) propounded to him by counsel for the petitioner, the answer thereto beginning at the bottom with the last paragraph of that page and concluding on the next. (P. 575).

In our Original Brief on the Merits we have discussed at some length the general proposition that Labor Unions are lawful, to which the Court is respectfully referred at pages 13-18, 82-90.

We have also discussed in our Original Brief (pp. 91, 92) the particular lawful purposes for which labor may organize, and also (pp. 93, 102) the constitution and purpose of the United Mine Workers, and also (pp. 103 118) the means adopted to carry into effect these purposes.

It seems to us incontrovertible that such a Labor Union as that of the United Mine Workers of America cannot be held by the courts to be unlawful. It is the policy of our Government to promote the welfare of the man who labors, whether in the mine, the factory, on our lines of transportation, on the farm or elsewhere.

Our own courts, Federal and State, recognize and enforce this policy, and the cooperation of the laboring man with his fellows in the form of organized effort to better his condition is left to his judgment, and in the exertion of these efforts he will not be restrained by any agency of the Government so long as he does not injure or attempt to injure the lawful rights of property.

The predominant sentiment of the American people is with the laboring man in all his lawful endeavors to improve his opportunities to elevate his standard of living—to obtain for himself and family the comforts of life, to make his environments safe and sanitary, to secure such compensation as will enable him to properly clothe and educate his children and thus inspire them with a love of country and an attachment to our institutions, and thus make for the general uplift of our whole country.

The prime agency in bringing about results of this character touching the condition of the laboring man is that of organization and to hold such an organization as the one now before the Court, unlawful would deal a blow to the progress of this age that might be accompanied with disastrous results in the end. We cannot arrest, if we were to try, the march of progress that this part of our great citizenship is now making, and, if we are to realize the hope of the founders of our Government, we must not attempt to do so. The laboring man knows that his situation is very little above that of serfdom if he cannot contract and act collectively with his fellows as a means of promoting his standard of wages. The collective wisdom and foresight of organized labor has prescribed, and will continue to do so in this country, the standard of compensation which the laboring man must receive. The general diffusion of knowledge by means of our educational facilities has enabled the common laborer to understand and fully appreciate his usefulness and power and his indispensable aid in promoting the growth of his own country. We are no longer dealing with the ignorant and illiterate man in the field of labor, but a man of intelligence and, in a large measure, a sense of independence, and we must therefore extend to him the same right to organize his agency of usefulness that we extend and secure to capital.

In the language of Circuit Judge Caldwell in his dissenting opinion in Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co., 83 Fed. 929,

> "In this country the right of wage earners and others to associate together and act collectively is not a boon granted by the Government. It is not derived from the constitution, statutes, or judicial decisions. It antedates the constitution. It is a natural and inherent right. It is the natural weapon of weakness. Its only enemies are despots, and those who would oppress the weak in the absence of the protection afforded them by organization and combined action. This right of men to combine together for lawful purposes necessarily carries with it the right of combined action. Of what utility is organization without the right of collective action? Collective action is implied in the very term "organization". Organization has no other object. Man, by nature, is a social being. Association and collective action, by those having common interests, for their protection and material, moral, and mental improvement, is a natural instinct. The British Parliament, whose power of legislation is unrestrained, and the English courts, in the beginning of the struggle between capital and labor, supposed that they could successfully permanently suppress this instinct; but, happily for mankind, the natural rights of man and the laws of nature proved more powerful and enduring than the acts of Parliament and the judgments of courts."

And as said by Mr. Justice Holmes in Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 57 Am. St. Rep. at pages 448, 449, especially at page 449,

> "it is plain from the slightest consideration of practical affairs, or the most superficial reading of industrial history, that free competition > means combination, and that the organization of the world, now going on so fast, means an ever-increasing might and scope of combination. It seems to be futile to set our faces against this tendency. Whether beneficial on the whole, as I think it, or detrimental, it is inevitable, unless the fundamental conditions of life are to be changed. One of the eternal conflicts out of which life is made up is that between the effort of every man to get the most he can for his services, and that of society, disguised under the name of capital, to get his services for the least possible return. Combination on the one side is patent and powerful. Combination on the other is the necessary and desirable counterpart, if the battle is to be carried on in a fair and equal way."

The observation contained in these dissenting opinions are expressive of the views of the courts generally, both State and Federal, with reference to the right of laboring men to organize for their mutual benefit, and to secure those advantages which they cannot obtain in the absence of collective action.

We therefore submit that the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit was clearly right, both upon reason and authority, in holding that this labor organization is lawful, and that the district court was in error in declaring a different judgment.

Counsel for the petitioner in the argument in this case (pp. 78, 79) refer to and quote from the case of United States vs. Weber et al (C. C. W. D. Va.) 114 Fed. Rep. 950, 953, as announcing the doctrine that the ultimate purpose of the United Mine Workers is not legal. This is obiter, because in that case the defendants, Weber and Haddow, were brought before the court on attachment for contempt in violating an injunction order issued in a case of which the court had jurisdiction. The only question there was whether or not the two defendants had violated the order of the court and were therefore guilty of contempt. Whether or not the United Mine Workers of America, of which they were members, was a lawful Labor Union was in no manner before the court, and whether they were members of such organization was not material upon the inquiry whether they had violated the injunction order. It was sufficient for the purposes of the case that the order had been entered and that the defendants had violated it. No feature of the case, as reported, made necessary the inquiry and determination whether or not the United Mine Workers of America was unlawful. The court evidently went beyond the scope of the case in making the statement referred to in its opinion. As a modern decision, as to this obiter dictum, it is isolated and without support, either upon reason or authority.

Perhaps it may be well to again refer to the obligation which a member of this labor union takes upon joining it (record, p. 15) and to which petitioner's counsel attach great importance as well as the learned District Court in holding this ogrnaization unlawful.

We have already given some consideration to this phase of the case in our Original Brief (pp. 120 124), and here call the attention of the Court to some pertinent authority and offer further reasons why this obligation does not render the Union unlawful.

> Schneider vs. Local Union No. 60, Association Journeymen Plumbers etc., of the United States and Canada, 116 La. 270; 40 So. 700.

The above was an action by Schneider and Shekeler against Local Union No. 60, United Association, Journeymen Plumbers, Gas Fitters, Steam Fitters, Steam Fitters' Helpers of the United States and Canada, by separate suit which was subsequently consolidated and tried together.

The action was brought for the recovery of damages for the illegal suspension of the plaintiffs from the defendant Union, resulting in a judgment in their favor from which an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of Louisiana.

As to the purposes of the organization the court in the course of its opinion said that

> "the declared purpose of the members of the Union in effecting their organization is to protect themselves from unjust and injurious competition, and to secure, through the power of organization, a steady demand and fair compensation for their labor and a position in society to which as wealth producers and citizens they are entitled."

The pledge required of all initiates and taken by the plaintiffs in the action is as follows:

> "I, ———— ————, in the presence of the members of this association, do truly promise and pledge my word of honor that I will yield obedience to all laws and legal summons that may be sent, said, or handed to me. I will not do any act in any way prejudicial to the best interest of this association, but will at all times endeavor to promote its prosperity and usefulness. I will at all times assist members of this association to the extent of my ability, defend them when unjustly treated or slandered, and cultivate for each and every member the warmest friendship and brotherly love. I will assist unfortunate or distressed members to procure employment and to secure just remuneration. I do further promise that I will never reveal any of the signs or workings of this association that may be now or hereafter confided to me, except in a lawful and authorized manner. I take this obligation voluntarily, without any mental reservation, and bind myself until death or honorable withdrawal, under the penalty of the scorn due to moral perjury and violated honor, as one unworthy of trust or assistance."

The General Assembly of Louisiana passed an act providing for a Board of Examiners of Plumbers for the City of New Orleans, and pursuant to its provisions, the mayor named three master and two journeymen plumbers to constitute this board, and the board elected a plumbing inspector. The Union instructed the plaintiffs as members of this board to vote for its candidate for inspector, but the plaintiffs, although members in good standing of Local Union No. 60, of the United Association of Plumbers, etc., ignored the recommendation of their Local Union, and voted for other men for the position of inspector, contrary to the resolution and request of their organization, and because of this action they were suspended.

The Local Union insisted that the plaintiffs had violated their pledge and therefore suspended them from membership, and the plaintiffs brought this action for damages in which an injunction was granted reinstating the plaintiffs as members of their Local Union.

The Supreme Court in affirming the decision of the court below decided that > "The obligation or pledge which an initiate in a labor union is required to take is to be construed with reference to the declared purposes of the organization, and is binding only in so far as those purposes are lawful and are to be attained by lawful means, and when such union attempts the accomplishment of those purposes by unlawful means, the initiate or member may properly say: 'I entered into no such contract.'"

(c)

The respondents have not combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy under the name of The United Mine Workers of America to unlawfully persuade, entice and procure petitioner's mine workers to break, violate and disregard their several contracts with petitioner.

The petitioner having attempted to bring the instant case before this Court by appeal on the ground that it involves certain Federal questions, among which is > that the United Mine Workers is a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade within the meaning of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, this feature of the case was discussed in our Original Brief (pp. 149, 155), but no Federal question having been raised by the pleadings of the petitioner this court dismissed the appeal but awarded a writ of certiorari. Of course, it will be conceded that only such questions as necessarily arise upon the pleadings will be considered by the Court on this writ.

It is alleged by the petitioner in its bill (record p. 6) that the United Mine Workers as a Labor Union was organized in 1890 and that respondents were members of it, even while petitioner was running its mine on a union basis under contract made by members of this organization beginning in 1903, and ending May 31, 1906.

It necessarily follows, therefore, as these respondents were already members of the organization before and at the time petitioner began to run its mine non-union, that they did not combine and conspire under the name of the United Mine Workers for the purpose of persuading, enticing or procuring petitioner's mine workers to break, violate or disregard their several contracts with the petitioner. It therefore logically follows that to sustain this charge of conspiracy the bare fact of membership in this organization must per se constitute a conspiracy, and every two or more persons belonging to this organization must necessarily be conspirators.

If this position taken by counsel for petitioner is sound, then any two or more members of practically every labor union in this country must be taken and treated as conspirators.

That a mere combination of persons may constitute a conspiracy, such combination must be for an unlawful purpose.

Pettibone v. United States, 148 U. S. 197, 37 Law. Ed. 419.

But it is alleged that these respondents formed themselves into a conspiracy under the name of The United Mine Workers of America, to persuade, entice, and procure petitioner's mine workers to break and violate their several contracts with petitioner, and therefore respondents, it is urged, are engaged in a conspiracy.

It is alleged by petitioner in its bill, naming all of them as defendants thereto,

> "that each and all of the said defendants * * * have agreed, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy, under the name of The United Mine Workers of America, to unlawfully persuade, entice, and procure your orator's miners or mine workers, * * * to break, violate, and disregard their several contracts with your orator," etc.

This allegation is positively denied by all the respondents served with process in this cause, (record, pp. 57, 58, 73), the other respondents, John Mitchell, W. B. Wilson, and Thomas Hughes, (record, p. 208), not being at any time served with process to answer therein.

The proof adduced by petitioner wholly fails to establish the conspiracy thus charged against the respondents.

If the respondents did form such conspiracy, they must have had knowledge before and when the suit was brought and at the time that alleged conspiracy was formed, that petitioner had contracted with its various employees as alleged in its bill (record, p. 5), and shown in evidence (record, pp. 264, 265), and accordingly the petitioner alleges in his bill that

> "each of said defendants is fully aware that your orator is operating a non-union mine; * * * that its employees are non-union; that said employees are required at the time of entering service to agree not to become connected with the Union, while employed by your orator, and that if they do join the Union their employment with your orator shall cease."

(Record, p. 16).

This allegation of the bill is clearly, distinctly, and positively denied in the answers, (record, pp. 58, 73), and we submit that the proof falls far short of establishing the truth of this allegation.

As to the evidence that these respondents did not know of the existence of this contract, we refer to our Original Brief on the Merits (pp. 48–51).

If there was a conspiracy formed to induce the petitioner's employees to break their several contracts, every man who entered into such a conspiracy must have had knowledge of its purpose in order to participate therein; and the bill alleges (record, p. 16), that each and all of these respondents formed themselves into this conspiracy (not some of the respondents, but all of them, giving their names); and of course, this, not being true, is denied by the answers.

(Record, pp. 57, 58, 73).

These respondents must have had knowledge of petitioner's contract with its employees, if they were in a conspiracy the object or purpose of which was to cause the petitioner's employees to break their contracts with petitioner.

Clemitt v. Watson, 14 Ind. App. 367, 42 N. E. 367.
United States v. Frisbie, 28 Fed. 808.
United States v. Cassidy, 67 Fed. 698.
People v. Mather, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 229, 21 Am. Dec. 122.

The record shows that the decree entered in this cause by the District Court on January 18th, 1913 (pp. 694–701), enjoined as conspirators to cause the petitioner's employees to break their several contracts with it the following named respondents:

Many of these respondents, so far as the record shows, did not even know that such a coal plant as that of petitioner existed, and of course had no knowledge or information that petitioner had a contract with each of its employees not to join The United Mine Workers of America.

It is certain that the following named respondents did not know that petitioner had such a contract with each of its employees as that mentioned in the bill (record, p. 5), and offered in evidence. (Record, pp. 264, 265).

Nearly all of the respondents above named, with the exception of probably one or two did not even know that such a coal plant existed as that of the petitioner. It is flatly absurd to say that the above named respondents formed themselves into a conspiracy under the name of The United Mine Workers of America to induce the employees of the petitioner to break their several contracts with it.

The respondents, William Green, A. R. Watkins, and John Zelenka were only at petitioner's mine once between June 12, 1906, when petitioner began to operate its mine non-union, and the granting of the restraining order in October, 1907, (record, p. 286), and this was the occasion of their calling on the superintendent at his office to talk with him on the subject of the petitioner re-unionizing its mine, and the conversation between the superintendent and these parties was gentlemanly and friendly; and the superintendent states (record, p. 297) that he told the respondents Green, Watkins, and Zalenka of the contract between the petitioner and its employees that the latter were not to become members of The United Mine Workers' Union and that petitioner was to run its mine as non-union. It is quite clear that the last three named respondents did not thereafter do anything to disturb the petitioner in the operation of its mine in any manner whatsoever. The only respondent that did visit the mine of the petitioner, and that too in a peaceable and law-abiding manner, was Thomas Hughes, and what he said and did is set out in the record, (pp. 297, 305-313, 330, 332-3, 336-7, 342, 356-7, 365-6, 370-2, 382-3, 386-7, 429-435, 437-443, 452, 458-460, 466-469, 471).

An examination of the record does not very clearly disclose whether Hughes had any notice of the existence of this contract or not, but that he did, is quite problematical. Indeed, there is no such a disclosure by the record as satisfactorily shows knowledge on his part of this contract.

But, be this as it may, it is incontrovertible that there was no conspiracy between Hughes and the other respondents to cause petitioner's employees to break their several contracts, so as to impute the acts and declarations of Hughes to them or to bind them by such acts and declarations; and, therefore, petitioner's charge under this issue (c) is not sustained by the record and the Circuit Court of Appeals so held as indicated in its opinion.

(Record, p. 712).

Efforts of Hughes unsuccessful to induce the few of petitioner's employees interviewed by him to join the Union.

The record discloses that petitioner at the time this suit was instituted had in its employ from about 160 to 175 men, and it cannot employ more than from 175 to 200 men, although the superintendent says there was then in its employ about 300 men. (Record, p. 25).

The record also discloses that the efforts of Hughes to induce the employees of petitioner to join the Union were of no avail whatever, and of the various employees of petitioner examined as witnesses (record, pp. 301, 313, 319, 327, 336, 343, 364, 375, 379, 428, 436, 439, 443, 447, 451, 455, 465, 467), in all some sixteen or seventeen, not one of them was affected by the statements or interviews of Hughes, and, so far as the record discloses, not a single man employed by petitioner expressed or even indicated any intention to quit petitioner's employment or to join the United Mine Workers of America.

The record in this case actually discloses no present injury or damages resulting or threatened from any acts imputable to the respondents.

The suit and injunction issued therein is predicated upon an alleged anticipated or threatened injury. In a proper case this ground for injunctive relief is conceded by respondents.

The threatened injury must be impending and avertible only by the protecting preventative process of injunction.

Truly vs. Wanzer, 5 How. (U. S.) 141, 12 Law. Ed. 88.

Missouri vs. Illinois, 180 U. S. 208, 45 Law. Ed. 497.

East Saint Louis Connecting Railway Company vs. Jarvis, 92 Fed. (C. C. A.) 721, 735.

No act of any sort relating to the employees of petitioner is imputable to any of the respondents, except said Hughes, who has never been served with process and never appeared to the cause to make defense thereto, and yet he is perpetually enjoined from doing all the various acts charged against respondents in the bill as his alleged co-conspirators.

The petitioner's case, as made on the face of its bill, is quite another and different one from that made after the answers filed thereto denying its material allegations imputing the many wrongful acts to the respondents therein stated and the evidence brought into the record in support of the petitioner's case.

The construction of the several contracts of petitioner with its employees.

The contract made by petitioner with each of its employees upon entering its service is in these words:

> "I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employee of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company; that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company that I will not make any efforts amongst its employees to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard the same read."

The contract is one of indefinite hiring with the right to quit at any time on the part of the employee and to discharge him at any time on the part of petitioner.

While this contract is not exactly the same as the one described in petitioner's bill (record, p. 5), but was adopted by the petitioner and went into effect January 1, 1908, for the purposes of this suit, let us treat it as the one mentioned in the bill.

The material part of the contract with which we are here concerned is that which provides as to the employee that he will not become a member of the United Mine Workers of America while an employee of the petitioner, and if at any time he wants to become connected therewith, he agrees to withdraw from its employment.

It will be observed that this contract gives the employee the option of remaining in the employment of the petitioner, or if he desires to become a member of the United Mine Workers of America to withdraw from its employment. If he should become a member of this Labor Union, he may still remain with and work for petitioner with its consent. It necessarily rests with the petitioner whether or not he will retain him in its employ.

Under this contract, the employee may discuss with representatives of this Labor Union the advisability of becoming one of its members, without violating the contract, but he can take no steps amongst its employees while in the employ of petitioner to unionize its mine without its consent. There is nothing in the contract to prevent an employee from having interviews with any representative of the United Mine Workers and considering with him the advantages, if any, of becoming connected with such Union. How is the employee to know while in the employment of petitioner whether or not he does want to join the United Mine Workers of America, and he has this right under the contract, unless he meets members of the United Mine Workers of America and confers with them as to the objects of the Union and the benefits and advantages conferred upon him by membership in it? Does the right to have these interviews and conferences thus conferred upon the employee under the contract preclude a representative or member of the Union from interviewing or conferring with the employee, in imparting to him information regarding the nature and objects of this Labor Union?

The right to obtain information concerning the United Mine Workers of America from any source whatever is not affected by the contract. This is left open to the employee and he may freely exercise this right. If this be true, how and upon what principle can any representative of this Labor Organization be enjoined from visiting an employee of petitioner, and from holding conversations and interviews with him, and thus present to such employee the various provisions of the constitutions of the national, district, and sub-district organizations, as well as the advantages to such employee of membership therein?

Let us not forget that though a part or all the employees of petitioner were to join the United Mine Workers of America, this does not "unionize" its mine. It must itself enter into contractual relations with the organization to become a unionized mine.

The mine is now for most purposes a union mine, except that it has not contracted with its men collectively, nor for a definite period, nor with them as members of the organization.

But how can it now be practically on a union basis? The following are the reasons why

Petitioner's mine is now practically on a Union basis:

First: It pays the same scale of wages to its non-union men that it paid to them while it ran its mine union.

(Record, pp. 263, 284, 363).

Second: There is no difference in the conditions upon which each man is employed, except that they are now employed by individual contracts for an indefinite term, and under the Union contracts were collective and for a definite term.

(Record, pp. 254, 285).

Third: Conditions are met under the non-union basis as when the mine was operated on a union basis.

(Record, p. 363).

Fourth: Petitioner's men have a committee to settle their grievances as when the mine was run non-union.

(Record, p. 363).

That petitioner is now practically on a union basis, the evidence of its own witness, William M. Daugherty, one of the men that has been in its employ in and from 1902 to the present time, is here quoted:

"Q. When a mine is run non-union what does that mean? What do you understand by that, Mr. Daugherty ?

A. Well, I have not worked at very many non-union mines. The one I am working at now is run on the same basis that it was when the United Mine Workers were in power there.

Q. Is it a non-union mine?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, you say that it was run pretty nearly on the same basis, did you say, as the others?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What do you mean by saying "It is run pretty nearly on the same basis as the others?"

A. I mean that we get the same price for our labor; we have the same conditions that are met in the same way; we have a committee and if we have any grievances we take it up under the same style as we did when we were in the United Mine Workers.

Q. You are practically continuing the same operations that you had when you were a part of the United Mine Workers?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then, is there any complaint to you people from the company on account of continuing that system?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Now, if you are continuing just as you did before what difference can you find in the matter of running non-union and running union in the conditions and methods of doing business at the Hitchman mine?

A. Well, one method is, since we have been running non-union we have never had any trouble of any kind and the mine has never been stopped.

Q. You mean when you have been running non-union you have run continously?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And when you ran union you had some strikes?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that practically the only difference between the two conditions—the one that prevailed when you had the union and the one that prevails when you have no union?

A. Well, there may be some other little difference.

Q. There may be some other little difference. Now, what would you say that consists in?

A. Well, it consists in this: That whenever we run out of an agreement we have the power to make our own agreement and go ahead and work. As it was before we had to wait for the officials to make it.

Q. You meet now and among yourselves you make an agreement. Haven't you been running at practically the same price all the time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then you have had no agreement to make as to your scale of wages since you started to run non-union? Is that right?

A. Yes, sir; there have been agreements made since then.

Q. Was the scale lowered or raised?

A. Well, the scale was—whatever the United Mine Workers' scale paid that is what we got.

Q. Then it was consented to by the operator and he was just conforming to the scale of the United Mine Workers?

A. He was just to pay the scale, yes, sir; whatever it was.

Q. And then also as to the conditions prescribed by the United Mine Workers?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. About the only difference now and when you ran union is that you don't have the advice of the officers of the United Mine Workers, whereas before you did have it. Is that right?

A. That is right."

(Record, pp. 363, 364).

It is not material to inquire why petitioner determined to run its mine non-union.

But if such inquiry were material, the grounds for so doing are set forth in the following answer made by petitioner's superintendent as a witness in this case to the question why his company insisted upon running non-union:

> "We can get better results. We don't have the shut-downs and the annoyances to which we were subjected through no cause of ours or our men either, when we were running union."

See further on this matter the evidence as disclosed by the record. (Page 256).

When the mine was run union, all the mine workers were employed by one contract for all the men and they were members of the union. See, as indicating in a general way, the form of this contract, pages 280 and 281 of the record.

But if petitioner had the right to employ none but non-union men in its mine, it is not material to inquire into its reasons for its abandonment of the union, or why it decided to operate its plant non-union. It is sufficient, so far as its right to do so under the law is concerned, that it decided upon a non-union policy for the operation of its mine beginning as it did in June, 1906.

That petitioner got better results when it runs non-union than when it operated as a union mine is not proved by the recoord in the case. If better results were obtained after the mine began to run non-union than when it was run on a union basis, there should have been, with the growth of petitioner's business and its markets and with as large indeed a larger number of employees, a gradual increase in the product of the mine in 1907, 8, 9 and 10, but such was not the case as we have already seen in this brief. (Pages 16, 17).

The respondents were never at any time engaged in a conspiracy to compel the petitioner to unionize its mine.

Anyone who understands the meaning or significance of the phrase "unionized plant" will at once conclude that it is utterly impossible to bring about the "unionizing" of a plant without the consent of the operator. A mine may be full of union men and still the plant not be "unionized." While it is outside of the record, at this time there are a number of coal plants in West Virginia which have none but union men in them and still they are not unionized mines. So there are a number of instances wherein union men are working in a plant as well as non-union men, and the mine is not unionized.

In order that there may be a "unionized mine," there must be a local union at or near the plant or mine to be unionized and a contract entered into on behalf of such local by a representative of the local union, which is usually one of the sub-district officers along with some member of the local union, on the one side, and the operator or his representative on the other, for a definite period of time, usually two years, providing a scale of wages, which is already adopted by the United Mine Workers, either in the sub-district or district in which the mine is located.

The contract provides for a settlement of grievances between the employer and employee and various other details designed for the good of the parties.

We have discussed the difference between unionizing the men working in a mine and unionizing the mine itself in our Original Brief, (pp. 156-185).

Inasmuch as there is not one scintilla of evidence in the record showing that any one of the respondents during the period between July 12, 1906, and October 24, 1907, or at any other time, ever attempted to unionize petitioner's mine without its consent, it is really a waste of time to say anything further on this subject than to observe, which the Court will see from the record itself, that at one time after the mine started to run non-union, which as we have seen, was on June 12, 1906, the respondents Green, Watkins and Zelenka visited the petitioner's superintendent at its mine in an endeavor to induce him to take up the proposition of reunionizing the mine, which the superintendent declined to consider, and these parties never made further effort to do anything more.

The respondents at the time of the institution of this suit, or at any other time, had not formed a conspiracy to compel by threats and intimidation petitioner's employees to join the United Mine Workers of America.

As already shown, the only person that visited the mines of the petitioner holding any interviews or conversation with the employees of petitioner was the respondent Thomas Hughes, who was never served with process, never brought into this case to make answer to the complaint and was the only person, so far as the record discloses, that had opportunity to employ any agency to induce the employees of petitioner to become members of the United Mine Workers of America.

The record is wholly barren of any evidence disclosing the use of force or violence of any kind exercised by said Hughes toward the men of the petitioner for any purpose whatever. We have already pointed out in this supplemental brief (p. 39) the parts of the record in which the appearance of Hughes about the premises or near the premises of the petitioner is disclosed.

The parts of the record showing the conduct of Hughes touching anything done by him to induce any employees of petitioner to join the Union appear therein at pages 330, 332-33, 356-57, 365, 372, 382-83, 386-87, 429, 437, 438, 440, 458, 459, 460, 466, 468, 469, 471.

The Court will perceive by referring to these pages that there were no threats of any sort made by Hughes to induce any employees of the plaintiff to join the Union nor were there any attempts whatever at intimidation. In fact from the petitioner's own testimony, the few statements in conversations with the employees on the part of Hughes was without any effect whatever upon the men, and in one or two instances he was directed by one of the employees of petitioner to leave the premises, and that Hughes promptly did so, and the sum and substance of any of his statements is that he was there for the purpose of trying to induce the employees ot the petitioner to join the United Mine Workers of America, and his efforts along this line may be treated as negligible.

It is certain beyond question that the allegation of the petitioner's bill that respondents were by threats and intimidation seeking to cause the petitioner's employees to become members of the United Mine Workers is not sustained by the proof in this case. This allegation of the bill is denied by the answer and we cannot find any evidence in the record to uphold it.

(f)

The United Mine Workers of America are not in their constitution violating the common and statute law of West Virginia or the constitution of that State.

The Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia has never decided the question whether or not a labor union is unlawful under its constitution and laws.

The case of Thacker Coal & Coke Company v. Burke, 57 W. Va. 253, does not decide the question now before the Court.

The Thacker Coal Company case was an action at law for the recovery of damages, the declaration containing four counts. The action was dismissed by the lower court upon a demurrer to the declaration.

> The first count in the declaration sets forth that the plaintiff was engaged in the business of mining coal, had in its employ a large number of men to work in the mines and who are actually engaged in the plaintiff's service; "that the defendants well knowing these facts, but contriving and wickedly and maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff in its business, unlawfully, wrongfully, maliciously, without justifiable cause, without the consent and against the will of the plaintiff, molested, obstructed and hindered the plaintiff in its said business by willfully, wrongfully and maliciously persuading, inducing, enticing and procuring said servants of the plaintiff employed as aforesaid to absent themselves and depart from the plaintiff's service; that by reason of such persuasion and enticement and procuration the said servants on the day named without license and against the will and consent of the plaintiff wrongfully absented themselves and departed from said service and continued to do so; that the plaintiff was unable to employ other servants to work in its mines in the place of the servants so enticed away, and was thereby prevented from procuring and carrying on its business as it could and would have done had the said employees not quit its service."

The second count in substance alleges special written contracts with certain miners, nine in number, whereby these miners agreed to enter the service of the plaintiff and engage in digging and shipping coal from its mine at a certain fixed rate per ton; that on the arrival of these men the defendants knowing of the contracts wrongfully, maliciously and with unlawful purpose to injure the business of the plaintiff, and against its consent, induced and enticed the said employees not to enter the service of the plaintiff and to refuse to enter its service according to these written contracts, and that by reason of such persuasion and enticement on the part of the defendants the said employees refused to enter the service of the plaintiff and immediately departed from the place where they were employed to work, and that none of the employees have returned to work in the mine of the plaintiff.

The third count in substance alleges that it had employed a certain person, naming him, to mine a specified number of tons of coal, and that this employee had entered upon the performance of his contract, and that defendants knowing of such contract wrongfully, maliciously and with unlawful purpose to injure the business of plaintiff, induced this employee to break his contract and refuse further to perform it, and by reason thereof quit the service of the plaintiff.

The fourth count in substance sets forth that the plaintiff being the owner and operator of the coal mine made special written contracts with several different persons (naming them) whereby each one bound himself to mine for the plaintiff a fixed amount of coal at a speci> fic rate per ton; that these employees actually started upon the performance of their contract, but that defendants well knowing thereof, contriving and falsely and maliciously intending to injure, vex, harrass, oppress and ruin the plaintiff in its business, unlawfully and maliciously did agree, confederate, combine and form themselves into a conspiracy under the name of The United Mine Workers of America, and in pursuance and execution of their conspiracy unlawfully, wantonly, wrongfully and maliciously and against the will of the plaintiff, did entice and procure these employees to break their contracts and refuse to continue their work of mining coal as required by these contracts and these employees have refused to perform said contract.

Under the state of facts thus alleged the Supreme Court of this State decided that the plaintiff's declaration presented a cause of action for damages against the defendant.

Of course if the defendants in the case cited did form themselves into a conspiracy for the purpose of wantonly and wilfully, without any cause whatever, to procure the employees of the plaintiff in that case to break their contracts and quit its service and thus entail upon it injury and damage in its business, it matters not what name they gave to this conspiracy and under what name they formed the conspiracy, it would afford no excuse for their wanton, willful and malicious acts.

The petitioner in its bill (record, p. 25) assails certain parts of the constitutions of the International, District and Sub-District organizations as in violation of the laws and constitution of West Virginia.

The parts of the Interantional Constitution complained of (record, p. 25) are sections 1, 3 and 4 of Article X, and are contained in the record. (Page 9).

It will be borne in mind that none of the provisions of the constitutions apply to any mine owners, except those who have recognized the Union, and entered into contractual relations with its members by the formation of a contract for a definite term and with such stipulations as the parties mutually agree upon.

Are the respondents seeking to enforce any one of the parts or provisions of these constitutions against the petitioner? They are not charged with doing so and there is nothing in the record that they are doing so.

The petitioner cannot claim in this suit that any parts of the constitution of the international organization are violative of the constitution and laws of West Virginia, unless it first shows that the respondents are seeking to enforce these parts against it to its detriment or damage.

This is upon the principle that persons who have suffered no harm by the provisions of a statute cannot challenge its validity.

As we have said in our Original Brief (pp. 143-148), the constitutions of the national and subordinate branches of this Labor Union are nothing more than by-laws for the government of the members thereof.

Dornes vs. Supreme Lodge, K. of P., 75 Miss. 466, 23 South. 191.

In Waterhouse vs. Comer, 55 Fed. 149, the validity of Rule 12 (a by-law) (referred to in argument of petitioner, pp. 154, 155,) was passed on by consent of all concerned, and in Toledo A. A. & N. M. Railway Company vs. Pennsylvania Company, 54 Fed. 780, the Union was about to enforce it, had really ordered its enforcement, and in both cases it was held that this Rule was in violation of Section 1 of the Act of July 2, 1890, known as the "Sherman Anti-Trust Law."

While none of the parts or provisions of these constitutions or by-laws is in contravention of the Constitution and Laws of West Virginia, yet if all the provisions of the Constitutions of the United Mine Workers of America were invalid under the constitution and laws of that State, it is not a matter of which petitioner can complain in this suit, because neither the petitioner nor any of its employees is in any wise connected with the Union or any of its branches, nor is any one of these by-laws sought to be enforced against petitioner.

Mogul Steamship Company vs. McGregor, L. R. 23 Q. B. D. 598, 610.

In State vs. Associated Press, as reported in 81 Am. St. Rep. at pp. 402, 403, the court said:

"And it has been determined that: 'A voluntary association, whether incorporated or not, has, within certain well-defined limits, power to make and enforce by-laws for the government of its members. Such by-laws are ordinary matters between the association and its members alone, and with which strangers have no concern.' American Livestock Company v. Chicago Livestock Exchange, 143 Ill. 210, 36 Am. St. Rep. 385, 32 N. E. 274."

In American Livestock Company vs. Chicago Livestock Exchange, the following is the third point of the syllabus as reported in 36 Am. St. Rep. at p. 386:

"A person who is not a member of a corporation, nor entitled, either directly or indirectly, to any of the rights arising from membership therein, cannot complain of any of the rules adopted by it for the government of the conduct of its members, or invoke the aid of a court of equity to restrain their enforcement."

And in its opinion the court said (p. 394):

"If it be admitted that said by-laws are so far in restraint of trade as to be invalid for that reason, we are unable to see that the position of the complainant is in any respect improved. By-laws or contracts in restraint of trade are illegal only in the sense that the law will not enforce them. They are simply void. The law does not prohibit the making of contracts in restraint of trade; it merely declines, after they have been made, to recognize their validity: Mogul Steamship Company vs. McGregor, L. R. 23 Q. B. D. 598, 619."

The petitioner has not averred or proved that the respondents as members of the United Mine Workers are seeking to enforce against or apply to the petitioner the provisions of Sections 1 and 2 of Article VIII and Section 15 of Article IX of the Constitution of District No. 6 set out in the record (p. 12) or the provisions of Article IV, Section 6 of Article VI and Sections 2 and 3 of Article IX of the Constitution of Sub-District 5 of District 6 of this Union set out in the record. (Pp. 13, 14).

Unless it be shown that these various parts of the different constitutions here referred to are sought to be applied to the petitioner, it cannot assail their validity on any ground whatsoever.

These constitutions can never be applied to a non-union mine.

Their application necessarily presupposes a mine or mines that have already been organized.

But it may be plausibly contended that Sections 2 and 3 of Article I of the Constitution of Sub-District 5 of District 6 (record p. 13) do apply and are intended by respondents to apply to the mine of petitioner.

This constitution was adopted by a sub-district of one of the districts of the United Mine Workers of America, organized, as we have seen, in 1890, and was in existence as to the territory to which it relates at the time, and for sixteen years before, petitioner began to operate its mine non-union in June, 1906.

Upon petitioner concluding in June, 1906, to no longer run its mine as a union mine, but thereafter to operate it on a non-union basis, did this change of method of operation ipso facto impose upon the respondents as members of this Labor Union the duty or obligation to make effort to eliminate petitioner's mine from this section of the sub-district constitution in which is defined the territory to which the instrument applies? This must be answered in the negative, because the organization of this sub-district as an abstract proposition, had the right to unionize the mine of petitioner if it could do so in a lawful manner, and it still has this right if it may lawfully do so. But it can only be done by contract mutually and voluntarily entered into by petitioner on the one side, and its employees as voluntary members of this Labor Union on the other side.

But let this be as it may, this sub-district constitution does not and cannot affect the petitioner so long as it declares its purpose to run non-union; and it has declared this to be its purpose and now so declares. It not only refuses to contract with this Labor Union and thus "unionize" its mine, but it even declares that its employees shall not be members of this Labor Union, and has so contracted with its several employees.

How then can petitioner complain of the constitution or by-laws of a Labor Union to which none of its employees belong and with which it has no contractual or other relations?

Aside from the reasons we have already assigned why the petitioner cannot complain of the constitutions of the international and subordinate organizations of the United Mine Workers as a Labor Union, it is submitted that these constitutions are only by-laws or rules for the government of the members of the Union, and as membership therein cannot be obtained except by the free and voluntary act or choice of the person desiring to join the Union, so if he desires to rid himself of the operation of these by-laws or rules, he is at liberty to quit the organization at any time.

To make a Labor Union violative of the common and statute law of West Virginia or the constitution of that State, it must per se amount to a conspiracy.

Inasmuch as neither the statute nor constitution of the State defines conspiracy we must look for its definition at the common law.

In Porter v. Mack & Boren, 50 W. Va. 581, the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia declares that > "There can be no conspiracy to do that which is lawful in a lawful manner."

This statement of the law of conspiracy is in harmony with the decisions everywhere defining this offence at common law.

See note to Cooley's Blackstone (4th Ed.) Vol. 2, Book IV, bottom page 1312, from which we take the following:

In Commonwealth v. Hunt, 4 Met. 111, S. C., 38 Am. Dec. 346, it is said: "It is a criminal and indictable offense for two or more to confederate and combine together by concerted means to do that which is unlawful and criminal, to the injury of the public, or portions or classes of the community, or even to the rights of the individual." * * * "A conspiracy must be a combination of two or more persons, by some concerted action, to accomplish some criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish some purpose not in itself criminal or unlawful, by criminal or unlawful means." See further on what constitutes this offense, O'Connell v. Queen, 11 Cl. & Fin. 155; Collins v. Commonwealth, 3 Serg. & R. 220; Miffin v. Commonwealth, 5 W. & S. 461; S. C., 40 Am. Dec. 527; State v. See also on this subject 5 Rul. Case Law pp. 1060, 1061 and the cases there cited, from the text of which we take the following:

"Chief Justice Shaw complained that he found, after examining the decided cases, great difficulty in framing any definition or description which specially identified the offense—a description broad enough to include all cases punishable under it, without including acts which are not punishable. He was of the opinion that as a general description, though perhaps not a precise and accurate definition, a conspiracy must be a combination of two or more persons, by some concerted action, to accomplish some criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish some purpose not in itself criminal or unlawful by criminal or unlawful means. This definition, or rather description, has been widely accepted, and although authorities have been able to specify certain combinations or even certain classes of combinations which the term conspiracy, as understood in law, connotes, it is doubtful if the definition has been improved upon. Substantially the same idea is variously expressed by attempting to define the term as an agreement, confederation or combination of two or more persons, to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means, or either to do an unlawful act or to accomplish by unlawful means a legal end, or to do something unlawful by legal or illegal means, or to effect a legal purpose by illegal means; or an unlawful confederacy or combination of two or more persons to do an unlawful act or combination of two or more persons to do an unlawful act or to have accomplished an unlawful purpose."

A labor organization as such under the common law definition of the term does not constitute a conspiracy, either under the laws of West Virginia, as shown in our Original Brief on the Merits (pp. 64–82) or under the laws of other States:

Lindsley & Company v. Montana Federation of Labor, 37 Mont. 264, 96 Pac. 127, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 707, 127 Am. St. Rep. 722.

Ames v. Union Pacific Railway Company, 62 Fed. 7, 14.

State v. Stockford, (77 Conn. 224) 107 Am. St. Rep. 28, 31.

The mere extent or size of the membership of an association of persons does not determine its legality, or make it a conspiracy.

Counsel for petitioner seem to attach great significance to the fact of the large membership of the United Mine Workers of America as a labor organization (petition, pp. 24, 25) and argue that it constitutes a monopoly.

It seems well settled that "the number who unite to do an act cannot change its character from lawful to unlawful."

> Bohn M'f'g. Company v. Northwestern Lumbermen's Association, (54 Minn. 223), 21 L. R. A. 337, 340.
> Martens v. Reilly, 109 Wis. 464, 84 N. W. 840.

In view of the reasons here presented and those offered in our Original Brief (pp. 63-90, 202-204) the conclusion follows that the United Mine Workers is a lawful association and does not constitute a conspiracy.

The means adopted to carry into effect the purposes of this Labor Union are lawful.

Now while it is clear that the United Mine Workers of America as an organization is lawful, it is equally clear that the means or agencies which it has adopted to make its purposes effectual are also lawful.

The agencies or methods adopted for the promotion of the objects of the association are those of conciliation, arbitration, and strikes, as shown by the international constitution, Section 2, Article I. (Record, p. 6).

These methods are explained by the president of the national organization, who is a practical coal miner, has been a member of the Union since its formation (record, p. 506) and whose evidence is uncontradicted. Of these methods this witness says:

> "Conciliation means the holding of conventions of operators and miners for the purpose of presenting their respective demands. That is the first step in the conciliatory feature of our union and has been practiced ever since it was organized. As to the next step—'arbitration'—it is generally understood by the operators and miners that we endeavor to arrive at intelligent conclusions as to our differences and arbitrate them ourselves. In other words, when we present our respective propositions, we enter into a general discussion of them. We then refer them to a committee of operators and miners, jointly, and under that system when that committee takes the matter up for further consideration, there are possibly a great many things that come out with regard to the detail or inner business methods of the operators that they do not desire discussed in open conference, because they are private matters. For instance, the operators have no desire to tell everybody the exact amount of profit they earn by their business, but they want to convey that information to the representatives of the miners as an argument against conceding what the miners' repretsentatives may demand in an open convention. But there are times also, when they present those things in order to show that they don't want to let their competitors, or let everybody know that probably they are making no money. There are a great many things in connection with that feature that are purely business matters and yet they are not laid bare to the people any more than such matters are in any other line of business. All these facts are brought out in joint scale committee meetings. After that if we can arrive at conclusions, or we can decide among ourselves that our demands have been unreasonable, and we have not been able to support them by the facts, and the miners have receded from their position, and the operators are unwilling to prove that their claims are correct and the > miners incorrect—there have been times when it has taken place when we disagreed, and we failed to arbitrate our differences, and there was no desire to refer them to any other source or any other method of arbitration, that it has resulted in what we call 'strikes' or a suspension of work, and the general proposition is to try and bring about a condition to have a wage contract agreed to for fixed periods of time and do away entirely with the necessity of suspending the operation of the mines in any section of the country."

From this part of the record, and our Original Brief (p. 103) it is shown that conciliation is a peaceful mode of settling any disagreement arising between employer and employees, whereby both parties in a friendly conference adjust their differences without a suspension of work, and injury to the parties concerned and to the public is thus avoided. This is one of the commendable features of this Labor Organization.

As to arbitration we refer to our Original Brief (pp. 103-4), and likewise as to strikes, (104-118).

The conclusion necessarily follows that neither the organization nor the methods adopted to make its purposes effectual are unlawful under the laws of West Virginia or general law, and that there is nothing as to this phase of the case of which the petitioner can complain.

The validity of the contract of petitioner with each of its employees.

We have considered the question of the validity of this contract in our Original Brief (pp. 41-48), and respondents' want of knowledge thereof (pp. 48-51), but we respectfully direct the attention of the Court to a further discussion of this question.

By this contract the petitioner agrees with each of its one hundred and seventy-five or more employees (all of them) that it will not employ in its mine any miner who belongs to the United Mine Workers of America, and each employee agrees not to become a member of such Union while in the employ of petitioner. While this contract is in existence no union laborer can obtain employment in petitioner's mine or in any other mine where such a contract is applied. This contract is in effect a combination whereby union miners are excluded from the business of mining coal prevented from following their trade. When this suit was brought there were 12,500 union miners in the sub-district in which petitioner's mine is located, and if effect is to be given to this contract not one of them can be employed in petitioner's mine. The one hundred and seventy-five non-union employees of petitioner have combined with it to keep any of these 12,500 union miners out of employment by the petitioner. Will a court of equity enforce such an unconscionable contract or combination?

The Court may properly say to the petitioner, "You are at liberty to employ only non-union labor if you so desire, and if any person or persons attempt, by intimidation, coercion, violence, or other unlawful method, to compel you to employ union miners, they will be restrained from so doing; but when you enter into an agreement with other persons, the tendency or effect of which is to keep union men from getting employment at your mine, or at any other mine where such a contract is in existence, or may be brought into existence by the joint act of the owner and the employees, a court of equity will not uphold and enforce such a combination.

And if any persons seek to induce your non-union employees to quit your service, simply because they are non-union men and by reason of such inducement they are about to quit your service, they will be restrained by a court of equity, but under no circumstances will this court aid you to enforce a contract, agreement, or combination, the effect or tendency of which is to prevent other men from obtaining employment simply because they are members of a Labor Union."

Such an agreement or contract is potent as a scheme in restraint of trade and for the suppression of competition.

It is not the effect or result of this contract with reference alone to petitioner's mine that determines its validity, but what may be accomplished by means of such a contract, if its validity be sustained and its provisions specifically enforced. We are to determine its fairness and soundness with reference to its effect and operation upon the rights of other men laboring or seeking labor in coal mines and upon the public.

The question of the validity of this contract has not been passed upon by the Supreme Court of West Virginia, but in Slaughter vs. The Thacker Coal & Coke Company, 55 W. Va. 612, we find the following:

> "Three coal mining companies operating in the same vein or seam in close proximity to one another and just having commenced the development of that particular kind of coal, organize, indirectly and nominally in the names of individuals, a third corporation to act as their general sales agent, and each gives it by contract the exclusive right to sell its entire output of coal, at prices uniform as to all three companies, and not to be departed from without the consent of all the companies, and said agent company is to advertise and introduce the coal in the markets, establish and control all agencies and sub-agencies, and make all sales and collections and deduct for its compensation ten cents per ton out of the proceeds of sales. Held: That the contract is illegal and void, its tendency being to suppress competition and retrain trade, contrary to public policy."

In Gas Company vs. Gas Company, 58 W. Va. 22, it is decided that > "Courts decline to enforce contracts which impose restraint, though only parital, upon business of such character that such restraint will to any extent repress competition and prejudice the public."

A grant of the "exclusive" right of way and privilege to construct and maintain tubing for the transportation of oil through a tract of 2,000 acres of land amounts to a covenant by the grantor not to use or grant similar privileges to others, and as such is in unreasonable restraint of trade, and void.

West Virginia Transportation Company vs. Ohio River Pipe Line Company, 22 W. Va. 600.

"Contracts in partial restraint of trade are valid if reasonable as to time, place, terms, etc., and if manifesting an intention to protect the party relying thereon in the reasonable restraint of unjust discriminations against him; but the reasonableness of such contracts, as between the parties, is the test only in those cases where public interests are not involved, and, even though a contract be fair and reasonable between the parties, yet, if it is so injurious to public interests that public policy, which promotes the freedom of engaging in and carrying on all kinds of trades and professions beneficial to the public, requires that it should not be enforced, it will be held void."

Tarr vs. Stearman, (Ill.) 105 N. E. 958.

While the decisions rendered by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia as well as the one from Illinois are not predicated upon agreements or contracts affecting the subject of labor, yet may we not apply them here by way of analogy? If so, then we respectfully submit that the contracts of petitioner with its several employees are such as not to be enforceable in a court of equity, nor can it call on a court of equity to protect and uphold such a contract.

The contract here is distinguishable from the one involved in Hoban vs. Dempsy, (217 Mass. 166), 104 N.

E. 717. In the latter case the contract was made by the representatives of certain Trans-Atlantic S. S. Companies with a labor union of longshoremen, and one of the provisions thereof in substance is that all longshoremen employed by the steamship lines shall be members of the defendant union whenever such men are available, and whenever such men are not available then other men may be employed until the defendant union can supply men, but in any event, men not members of the defendant union may be employed until the end of the day.

The suit sought to enjoin the enforcement or carrying of this contract into effect by the members of another labor union of longshoremen.

The Court, in the course of its opinion, discussing this contract, said:

> "This is a simple case where employers and a union of employees have made an agreement freely and without any kind of restraint, the terms of which do not require the breaking of contractual relations with any one, to the end that all the work of a specific kind be given to the members of a union so far as they are able to do it, for a limited period of time. If a sufficient number of union men are not supplied, the employer may hire whom he chooses. For ought that appears, the contract may have followed competition between rival groups of workmen to secure the work."

The contract now before the Court is indefinite as to its term, and, according to the facts in this case, will be adhered to by the petitioner as long as he continues in the coal business, so that petitioner may not hire whom he chooses, but can only employ non-union laborers, and is not at liberty to engage union laborers under the contract.

It is the policy of all the governments of the States to keep the avenues of employment open and free, that the laborer may find ready employment at remunerative wages, and thus sustain himself and family without becoming a charge to the State. So jealous is the State in guarding this principle that an agreement made by the laborer himself not to follow his occupation or to engage in a particular business is objectionable, because it tends to deprive the party of the means of earning a livelihood and the community of the benefit of his activities and to compel him to transfer his residence and allegiance to some other State or country, in order to pursue his occupation, and it also lessens competition and enables organized capital to silence competition and places the public at its mercy.

If the laborer himself cannot make a contract lessening the opportunities for his employment or deprive him from following his occupation or trade, can an employer of labor enter into a contract with his own employees, the effect or tendency of which is to close the avenues of employment to another class of laborers in the same line, and then appeal to a court of equity to uphold him in such a project? Will not the court decline to extend to him any relief in such a case, and say to him in emphatic terms: "You are at liberty to employ whom you please, but you cannot form a combination or scheme of any sort to deprive other people of employment or which tends to close the avenue to their employment."

But for the sake of the Argument, if the validity of the contract be conceded, the Bill of Complaint of the Petitioner was properly dismissed by the Circuit Court of Appeals.

The United Mine Workers of America is an unincorporated voluntary association, and of the association itself, a Federal court has no jurisdiction on the ground of diverse citizenship, the sole ground of the court's jurisdiction in this case.

Taylor vs. Weir, (C. C. A.) 171 Fed. 636.

Chapman vs. Barney, 129 U. S. 677, 32 Law. Ed. 800.

Irving vs. Joint District Council, etc., 180 Fed. 896, 898.

if a Federal court has no jurisdiction of an unincorporated voluntary association, as such, it cannot take jurisdiction thereof by representation, and the effort of the petitioner to do so by making respondents defendants to the bill as individuals, and also as officers of this association, is necessarily ineffectual as an attempt to create jurisdiction over the association and its various members who are not parties to the suit.

In Irving vs. Joint District Council, etc., 180 Fed. 896, the complainants were citizens of Massachusetts, and the defendants were (1) The Joint District Council of New York and Vicinity of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America and the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners of America and the members of said Joint District Council; (2) Edward H. Neel, as secretary of the Joint District Council and individually; (3) David French, Joseph Crimmins, L. E. Story, Henry W. Blumenburg, Henry Erickson, William O'Grady, Frederick Dhuy, Harry Lea, Thomas Dalton, Frank Hellereith, George Lynch, August Nagel, James B. Smith, James Martin, Julian Wazeter, individually and as business agents of said Joint District Council; (4) Charles H. Baushher, individually and as business agent of the said Joint District Council, and as a member of the General Executive Board of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America; Frank Duffy, individually and as secretary of the United Brotherhood; (5) William D. Huber, individually and as president of the United Brotherhood.

In the course of the opinion in this case, the court with reference to its jurisdiction of the associations and the members generally, said:

> "The bill may be dismissed as to the Joint Council and its members generally, and > stand as to the other defendants, in accordance with the practice indicated in Oxley Stave Company v. Coopers' Union (C. C.) 72 Fed. 695, affirmed 83 Fed. 912, 28 C. C. A. 99. There are intimations that service upon some of the members of such associations may be good as against the association and the other members in United States v. Coal Dealers' Association, (C. C.) 85 Fed. 252, American Steel and Wire Company v. Wire Drawers' Unions 1 and 3 (C. C.) 90 Fed. 598, and Evanston v. Spaulding, 150 Fed. 517, 82 C. C. A. 263, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 904. If these cases mean more than that members of the association not served may be held guilty of contempt if they knowingly assist in the violation of an injunction which has been granted, I am not disposed to follow them."

In Oxley Stave Company v. Coopers' International Union of North America et al., 72 Fed. 695, the bill was in equity against the union trades assembly of Kansas City and various individuals named, who are officers and members of such organization and also all other persons who may be members of either of said organizations, their agents, attorneys, etc., to enjoin them from inaugurating and maintaining a boycott against the use of packages, casks, barrels, etc., made by complainant by means of machinery constituting a part of its plant.

In the course of the opinion in this case, the court said:

> "The defendants, James A. Cable and William Deal, have filed pleas to the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that they and other members of said associations are not citizens of Kansas, but are citizens of Missouri. From the evidence in the case, these pleas are well taken. It is also objected that the defendant associations cannot be sued as a body, or its members enjoined who are not parties to the record. These objections are also well taken, and the complainant has leave to dismiss as to said parties, and the case stands only against the other defendants named in the bill."

This case was taken by appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Eighth Circuit and was on appeal affirmed and is reported in 83 Fed. 912.

The Circuit Court of Appeals in its opinion in this case discussing the question of the court's jurisdiction, said:

"The first proposition contended for by the appellants is that the trial court acted without jurisdiction in awarding an injunction. The ground for this contention consists in the fact that in the bill, as originally filed, two persons were named as defendants who were citizens and residents of the State of Missouri, under whose laws the Oxley Stave Company was incorporated. But as the case was dismissed as to these defendants, and as to the two voluntary unincorporated associations, and as to all the members thereof who were not specifically named as defendants in the bill of complaint, before an injunction was awarded, and as the bill was retained only as against persons concerned in the alleged conspiracy who were citizens and residents of the State of Kansas, the objection to the jurisdiction of the trial court is, in our opinion, without merit. Oxley Stave Company v. Coopers' International Union of North America, 72 Fed. 695. It is further urged that the trial court had no right to proceed with the hearing of the case in the absence of any of the persons who were members of the two voluntary organizations, to-wit, the Coopers' Union, No. 18, and the Trades Assembly of Kansas City, Kansas, because all the members of those organizations were parties to the alleged conspiracy. This contention seems to be based on the assumption that every member of the two organizations had the right to call upon every other member for aid and assistance in carrying out the alleged conspiracy, and that an injunction restraining a part of the members from rendering such aid and assistance would necessarily operate to the prejudice of those members who had not been made parties to the suit. In other words, the argument is that certain indispensable parties to the suit have not been made parties, and that full relief, consistent with equity, cannot be administered without their presence upon the record. We do not dispute the existence of the rule which the defendants invoke, but it is apparent, we think, that it has no application to the case at hand. The present suit proceeds upon the theory—without which no relief can be afforded—that the agreement entered into between the members of the two voluntary associations aforesaid is an unlawful conspiracy to oppress and injure the plaintiff company; that no right whatsoever can be predicated upon, or have its origin in, such an agreement; and that the members of the two organizations are jointly and severally liable for whatever injury would be done to the plaintiff company by carrying out the object of the alleged agreement. The rule is as well settled in equity as it is at law that, where the right of action arises ex delicto, the tort may be treated as joint or several, at the election of the injured party, and that he may, at his option, sue either one or more of the joint wrongdoers. Cunningham v. Pell, 5 Paige 607; Wall v. Thomas, 41 Fed. 620, and cases there cited. We perceive no reason, therefore, why the case was not properly proceeded with against the appellants, although numerous other persons were concerned in the alleged combination or conspiracy."

This suit is therefore between the petitioner, as plaintiff, a citizen of West Virginia, and the respondents, as citizens of States other than West Virginia.

If the respondents are guilty of the wrongs imputed to them in the bill, they alone are responsible to the petitioner, either by an action at law (petitioner's argument pp. 188, 193–5), or by an injunction. (Idem pp. 188, 196–202).

If they are not guilty of these wrongs then the bill should have been dismissed at petitioner's cost, as the Circuit Court of Appeals decided.

Ten of the respondents are made parties defendant to the bill (record, p. 2), and the other seven respondents were made defendants in their official capacity by the final decree rendered by the District Court perpetuating the injunction as to all seventeen of the respondents.

(Record, pp. 694-701).

Of these seventeen respondents only seven were served with process; the other ten were never served with process and made no general appearance to the cause; only three of these other ten were made defendants to the bill and seven of these other ten were never made defendants to the bill by naming them as such therein, and made no appearance whatever thereto.

This suit is therefore against petitioner as a citizen of West Virginia and T. L. Lewis, William Green, D. H. Sullivan, George W. Savage, A. R. Watkins, John Zelenka, and Lee Rankin, citizens of the State of Ohio, and as the other respondents were not before the court, the learned District Court could only perpetuate the injunction against these last named seven respondents who were parties to the suit and served with process to answer therein.

The court could neither award nor perpetuate an injunction against persons not parties to the suit.

Oxley Stave Company v. Coopers' International Union, etc., supra.

Inasmuch as only the seven respondents named above were before the court, if the bill cannot be sustained as to them, it must be dismissed.

The entire record is absolutely barren of proof, as to one single unlawful act complained of in the bill imputable to them, tending to sustain the issues raised by the pleadings.

As we have already clearly seen, there is no proof in the record connecting any of the respondents that were brought before the court, with the many and various charges made in the bill, and which charges are specifically and separately set out at pp. 92-94 of this supplemental brief.

There being no conspiracy on the part of the respondents as alleged but denied by answer and not proved, the declarations of Hughes are not binding upon the respondents before the court, and it is upon his act and declarations that the petitioner must rely for proof of its bill; and while these acts and declarations are not evidence against the seven respondents that were brought before the District Court, we have nevertheless directed the attention of the Court to just what Hughes said and did in our Original Brief at pp. 161-178.

Solicitation of petitioner's employees by Hughes to join the United Mine Workers of America not imputable to the other resposdents.

As the evidence discloses that the only person making solicitation of any of the employees of the petitioner was the respondent, Hughes, who was never before the court in this case by the service of process or appearance thereto and that there was no conspiracy between him and the respondents who were before the court, of course, no injunction could be awarded against him in this cause. But, will the Court treat the acts of solicitation by Hughes of a very few of the employees of petitioner to become members of this Labor Organization, as the acts of the seven respondents who were properly before the court because Hughes and these respondents were members of the United Mine Workers of America, and thus perpetuate the injunction as to this feature of the case against the seven respondents who are parties to the suit and served with process to answer?

It seems to us that to do so there must be clear proof in the record, first, showing a conspiracy on the part of the seven respondents and Hughes to induce the petitioner's employees to become members of the United Mine Workers; second, that the acts of Hughes were in furtherance of this conspiracy; third, that these seven respondents had knowledge of the existence of this contract between petitioner and its various employees not to join this Labor Organization; fourth, that the acts of Hughes in soliciting petitioner's employees to become members of the Union would result in petitioner's employees or a material part thereof in joining this Labor Union; and fifth, if they did join this Labor Union, petitioner would suffer irreparable damage in consequence thereof.

The first of these requisites, to hold these seven respondents amenable to the injunctive process of the court for the acts of Hughes, is not made out by proof in the cause. The record is absolutely barren of evidence of any kind that these respondents entered into an agreement, combination, or conspiracy among themselves or with Hughes, to solicit or induce the employees of petitioner to join this Labor Union.

There is no evidence that any of the said seven respondents, the only ones that were before the court for the purposes of its injunction, were even together at petitioner's mine, or in its vicinity. The only thing to enable them even to be acquainted with Hughes was the fact that at the time this suit was instituted they were members of the United Mine Workers of America.

Will it be inferred from the common membership of Hughes and these seven respondents in this Labor Union, that they were all in a conspiracy to solicit the employees of petitioner to become members thereof? This common membership justifies no such inference. These seven respondents were members of this Labor Union, even while petitioner was operating its mine on a Union basis, under a contract between it and the Union.

There are no circumstances disclosed by the record from which it can be inferred that these seven respondents and said Hughes entered into a combination or conspiracy for the purpose of soliciting or persuading petitioner's employees to become members of the United Mine Workers of America.

We have examined the record carefully and we are unable to find a particle of evidence of a combination or conspiracy between these respondents and Hughes, to induce in any manner petitioner's employees to join this Labor Union.

The first essential fact to hold these respondents liable for the acts of Hughes not being established, it scarcely seems necessary to notice the other four. But to show how utterly void of merit in a court of equity petitioner's complaint is, we shall notice the fourth and fifth essentials incumbent upon the petitioner to establish.

The mere fact that Hughes solicited the employees to join the Union, without more, does not authorize the issuance of an injunction.

It must clearly appear on the final hearing, that a perpetual injunction may issue, that by reason of this solicitation the petitioner's employees or some of them are about to "become members of the United Mine Workers of America," and that they will do so unless an injunction is awarded to prevent further solicitation.

The record discloses that only a very few of petitioner's men were approached by Hughes, and that they repelled all of his suggestions and solicitations to join the United Mine Workers. For illustration, see what occurred between the witness Pickett, petitioner's mine superintendent, and Hughes (record, pp. 306, 307, 308–311); the witness Corns, an employee of petitioner (record, pp. 330, 332, 333*)*; the witness Daugherty, another employee (record, pp. 356, 357, 358, 365, 366*)*; the witness Hart, also an employee (record, pp. 370, 371, 372, 373); the witness Jarrett, another employee, (record, pp. 382, 383, 386, 387*)*; the witness Knapp, petitioner's master mechanic, (record, pp. 439, 440); the witness Logston, another employee, (record, p. 452), and the witness Myers, another employee, (record, pp. 458–461).

A mere speculative conjecture on the part of petitioner that his employees or a part of them will join the United Mine Workers of America is not sufficient on the final hearing of the cause to make the injunction perpetual. It must clearly appear from the evidence that unless the injunction is issued all his employees or a material part thereof will join the United Mine Workers of America. The petitioner has assumed that because a few of its employees were interviewed by Hughes and by him solicited to become members of the United Mine Workers of America that, therefore, those employees will join the United Mine Workers of America and, therefore, all of the respondents must be perpetually enjoined upon these acts of solicitation on the part of Hughes alone from doing a thing that the evidence shows they never attempted to do, and many of whom were never at or near the coal mining plant of petitioner and some of whom, so far as the record discloses, did not even know of the existence of this coal plant.

It is clear, therefore, that the fourth essential ground, upon which a perpetual injunction may issue, is wholly unsustained by the proof and the United States Circuit Court of Appeals committed no error in reversing the District Court that had issued and perpetuated the injunction.

The fifth essential to be shown as ground for a perpetual injunction is that damages will be sustained by the petitioner if its employees or a part of them should join the United Mine Workers of America.

We are keeping in mind the charge that respondents are in a conspiracy to induce the employees of petitioner to join the United Mine Workers of America and that the acts of Hughes are in furtherance of this conspiracy.

A conspiracy is indictable whether any act is done under and by it or not, but to sustain a civil action therefor damages must have resulted therefrom.

City of Boston v. Summons, (Mass.) 6 L. R. A. 629.

This is not a civil action for the recovery of damages, but an injunction to restrain alleged threatened damages. If the action were one to recover damages already committed, the quantum recoverable would be measured by the extent of petitioner's injury. It does not appear what the injury could possibly have been if petitioner's employees or some of them were members of this Labor Organization. If they were members of the Labor Union, these men would still be efficient workmen, receive the same wages as non-union employees, would necessarily work under the same conditions as the other employees, and would necessarily produce the same results as if they were not members of the Union.

If, then, the solicitations of Hughes had been of such a character, if continued, that some of petitioner's employees were about to become members of the Union, that is, they were about to violate their contracts by joining the United Mine Workers of America, how could this have caused damages or injury to the petitioner? In what way could injury or damage have been sustained?

If any damages could have been sustained, they must necessarily have been nominal, had Hughes succeeded in his solicitations; so if the injunction could have been perpetuated in this case, it could only have been to inhibit threatened nominal damages.

The authorities show that an injunction issues only to avert threatened substantial damages or injury.

Allis Chalmers Company v. Reliable Lodge, 111 Fed. 264.

Inasmuch as the petitioner, as shown by the record in this suit, could only have recovered nominal damages against Hughes in an action at law, had such an action been brought, the injunction could only issue, as against the respondents to restrain the commission of threatened nominal damages, assuming that a conspiracy had been formed between Hughes and the other respondents to induce the petitioner's employees to join the United Mine Workers of America. This being the state of the case, this Court is asked to reveres the United States Circuit Court of Appeals and affirm the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia perpetuating the temporary injunction awarded in this case as to all the alleged wrongs imputed to the respondents in petitioner's bill, all of which are denied by the answers (record, pp. 53-84) and in the absence of the necessary and requisite proof to sustain said bill. The character and extent of this injunction is shown by the record at pages 694-701.

The final decree of the learned District Court perpetuating the temporay injunction awarded on the 26th day of May, 1908, (record, pp. 32-36) is predicated upon the assumption that petitioner has proved its bill, under the positive denial of the allegations thereof, as to all the wrongs therein alleged against the respondents, while the record discloses almost an entire want of proof to sustain the material allegations thereof.

The parts of the decree containing the acts enjoined consist of eleven paragraphs (record, pp.698-701) beginning with the last paragraph on page 698 and ending on page 701, immediately preceding the paragraph decreeing the payment of all the costs in this suit against the several respondents served with process to answer the petitioner's bill.

The respondents, Lewis, Sullivan and Svaage were at no time ever in the vicinity of the petitioner's mine, and there is no proof of any wrongful acts imputed to Green, Watkins, Zelenka and Rankin affecting the petitioner's men or its business, and there is no tstimony of any conspiracy between them and respondent Hughes; and it is indisputably shown (record, p. 624) that respondent Rankin severed his membership with the United Mine Workers of America about three years before the final decree in this case was rendered, and yet the burden of all the costs in this suit is placed upon these unoffending respondents, Lewis, Sullivan, Savage, Green, Watkins and Zelenka and Rankin, who long before the final hearing ceased to be a member of this Labor Union.

It is true that the witness McKinley (record, pp. 414, 415) testifies to some general declarations of respondent Rankin, but there is not a single word connecting him with any wrongful act done with reference to petitioner's mine.

Petitioner's authorities do not apply to this case.

For illustration, Lumley vs. Guy, 2 El. & Bl. (75 E. C. L.) 216, was an action at law, and as stated by Compton, J.

> "The declaration in this case consisted of three counts. The two first stated a contract between the plaintiff, the proprietor of the Queen's Theatre, and Miss Wagner, for the performance by her for a period of three months at the plaintiff's theatre; and it then stated that the defendant, knowing the premises and with a malicious intention, whilst the agreement was in full force, and before the expiration of the period for which Miss Wagner was engaged, wrongfully and maliciously enticed and procured Miss Wagner to refuse to sing or perform at the theatre, and to depart from and abandon her contract with the plaintiff and all service thereunder, whereby Miss Wagner, wrongfully, during the full period of the engagement, refused and made default in performing at the theatre; and special damage arising from the breach of Miss Wagner's engagement was then stated. The third count stated that Miss Wagner had been hired and engaged by the plaintiff, then being the owner of Her Majesty's Theatre, to perform at the said theatre for a certain specified period as the dramatic artiste of the plaintiff for reward to her in that behalf, and had become and was such dramatic artiste for the plaintiff at his said theatre for profit to the plaintiff in that behalf; and that the defendant, well knowing the premises and with a malicious intention, whilst Miss Wagner was such artiste of the plaintiff, wrongfully and maliciously enticed and procured her, so being such artiste to the plaintiff, to depart from and out of the said employment of the plaintiff, whereby she wrongfully departed from and out of the said service and employment of the plaintiff, and remained and continued absent from such service and employment until the expiration of her said hiring and engagement to the plaintiff by effluxion of time; and special damage arising from the breach of Miss Wagner's engagement was then stated."

This case is cited in argument of counsel for petitioner at pp. 172, 232, 233, 235, 236.

In most of the cases of the class to which the foregoing belong, the contract was one for definite service, and in a few instances for service at will, and the wrong consisted of the wanton or willful and malicious acts of the defendants causing the employees to actually quit the service of their employer, and the injury was the damage to the business of the plaintiff caused by the actual loss of service needed or required to carry it on.

In the case now before the court there is not a scintilla of proof that any one of the respondents did a single act to induce any one of the employees of petitioner to quit its service, or to induce any one not to enter into its service, and there is no proof of any kind that the respondents caused any employee to leave the petitioner's service, and the record in fact shows that not a single employee of petitioner ever left its employment, or ever indicated any intention of doing so. The facts in this case are very different from those found in the cases cited by counsel for petitioner.

There is another class of cases cited and relied upon by counsel for the petitioner in which the facts are so different or so much at variance from the facts in the case now before the Court that it is difficult to discern how they are to be applied here. Take for illustration the following:

Adair vs. United States, 208 U. S. 161— holds unconstitutional a statute making it a crime to discharge an employee because he belongs to a Labor Union.

Adams vs. Brennan, 177 Ill. 194, 52 N. E. 314— holds that a board of education has no right to stipulate in a contract that none but union labor shall be employed—is restrictive of competition.

Aikens vs. Wisconsin, 195 U. S. 194, 49 Law. Ed. 154, upholds the validity under U. S. Const. 14th Amend. of a State statute prohibiting a combination for the purpose of willfully or maliciously injuring another in his business.

Allgeyer vs. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 41 Law. Ed. 832—holds unconstitutional a statute of Louisiana which forbids the making of a contract for insurance with any Marine Insurance Company that has not complied with certain provisions of such statute.

American Malting Company vs. Keitel, 209 Fed. 351—involved only the question of the power of courts of equity to restrain the publication of libels.

Atchison, T. & S. F. Railway Company, vs. Gee, 140 Fed. 153—simply holds the defendants in that case guilty of contempt for willfully and persistently violating an injunction.

Gompers vs. Buck's Stove & Range Company, 221 U. S. 418, 55 Law. Ed. 797—was a review on a writ of certiorari of a judgment of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia affirming a judgment of imprisonment for contempt in violating an injunction against the continuance of a boycott.

Building Trades Council, Gray et al., vs., 91 Minn. 171, 97 N. W. 63—was an injunction awarded on bill and accompanying affidavits enjoining a boycott.

Butchers' Union, etc., Company vs. Crescent City, etc. Company, 111 U. S. 746, 28 Law. Ed. 585—involved the validity of a state statute giving to the plaintiff in the suit the sole right of butchering live stock within certain prescribed territory.

Casey vs. Cincinnati Typographical Union No. 3 et al., 45 Fed. 135—was a case in which an injunction was awarded upon the face of the bill and accompanying affidavits, enjoining a conspiracy to boycott a newspaper for refusing to unionize its office.

Coffeyville Vitrified Brick & Tile vs. Shanks, 69 Kan. 297, 76 Pac. 856—was an action to recover damages by the plaintiff for his discharge because he belonged to a labor union under a statute which made it unlawful to do so, and the court held the statute unconstitutional.

Crump vs. Commonwealth, 84 Va. 927, 6 S. E. 620—was an indictment for a conspiracy to boycott a newspaper company for its refusal to unionize its office.

Hopkins vs. Oxley Stave Company, 83 Fed. 912—was a conspiracy to compel the company by means of a boycott to discontinue the use of a hooping machine.

Loewe et al., vs. Lawler et al., 208 U. S. 274, 52 Law. Ed. 488—was a private action to recover damages under the Anti-Trust Law and the court held that a combination by members of a labor organization to destroy by means of a boycott an existing inter-state traffic in hats violated this law.

Lochner vs. New York, 198 U. S. 45, 49 Law. Ed. 937—involved the constitutionality of a statute of that State limiting the hours of employees in bakeries, which the court held to be in contravention of the 14th Amend. U. S. Const.

Martel vs. White, 185 Mass. 255, 69 N. E. 1085—was an action at law for damages for acts in the nature of a boycott which resulted in the ruin of plaintiff's business.

Moran vs. Dumphy, 177 Mass. 485, 59 N. E. 125—was an action by an employee to recover damages against the defendant who, by false statements, had caused the plaintiff's discharge.

Munn vs. People of Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 Law. Ed. 77—was decided on a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Illinois and involved the sole question of the constitutionality of a law of that State fixing a maximum charge for the storage of grain in warehouses at Chicago and other places.

O'Brien vs. People, 216 Ill. 354, 75 N. E. 108—was a proceeding for contempt in disobeying an injunction issued to prevent the defendant from intimidating its employees while engaged at work.

People vs. Marcus, 185 N. Y. 257, 77 N. E. 1073—held a statute of New York unconstitutional making it a criminal offense for an employer to exact an agreement from an employee not to join a labor union.

Pocahontas Coke Company vs. Powhatan Coal & Coke Company, 60 W. Va. 508—holds that a contract in unreasonable restraint of trade is void and not enforceable.

Purvis vs. Local No. 500, U. B. of Carpenters and Joiners, 214 Pa. St. 348, 63 Atl. 585—was a case wherein a labor union sought to coerce an employer to employ only union workmen, and threatened to ruin his business if he did not do so.

Singer Sewing Machine Company vs. Union Buttonhole & Embroidery Company, 22 Fed. Cas. 220, No. 12,904—was a case wherein an injunction was issued in favor of one of the parties to a contract restraining the other party thereto from violating the contract.

State vs. Goodwill, 33 W. Va. 179—simply holds a statute of West Virginia void which forbids a mining or manufacturing company from issuing in payment of its employees anything except that specified in the statute.

State vs. Gidden, 55 Conn. 46, 3 Am. St. Rep. 23—was an indictment for a conspiracy to compel a publishing company, against its will, to discharge its workmen and employ such workmen as defendants should name, and to injure workmen then in its employ by depriving them of their employment.

State vs. Stewart, 59 Vt. 273, 9 Atl. 559—was an indictment for a conspiracy to hinder and prevent a certain corporation from employing certain workmen and to deter others from working for it.

Tunstall vs. Stearns Coal Company, 192 Fed. 808—was a case wherein there was a preliminary injunction awarded upon the face of the bill against the defendants restraining them from the use of violence, threats, intimidation, and bribery, to cause and induce the plaintiff's employees to quit its service.

United States vs. Haggerty, 116 Fed. 510—was a proceeding for contempt for violating an injunction restraining the defendants therein from the use of threats and intimidation to bring about a strike on the part of the employees of the plaintiff in the injunction suit.

Young vs. Commonwealth, 101 Va. 853, 45 S. E. 327—was a writ of error upon a conviction and fine for the violation of a statute of Virginia prohibiting the use of trading stamps, trading checks, and similar gift enterprises, and providing a punishment for those who used them.

Many excerpts from judicial decisions and opinions appear in the written argument of counsel for the petitioner to the effect that where there is a contract between two persons for personal service to be rendered by one to the other, an action lies against a third party who induces the former to break his contract and thereby, as a natural consequence of such breach, causes loss to the other.

(Argument, pp. 107-108, 114, 115, 117, 118, 119, 120, etc.)

This principle or rule of law, and others of like character, found in the argument of counsel for petitioner, must be "construed with reference to the question actually under consideration by the Court in that case, and should not be extended beyond for any purpose of authority in another and different case."

"A judicial decision is to be considered as authority only in connection with the facts on which it was decided."

(American National Bank vs. Fountain, supra.)

"General language in an opinion is to be construed with reference to the facts of the particular case."

(Halbour vs. Cuenin, supra.)

"In applying cases which have been decided, what may have been said in the opinion should be confined to, and limited by, the facts of the case under consideration when the expressions relied upon were made, and should not be extended to cases where the facts are essentially different."

(Crane vs. Bennett, supra.)

For illustration take the statement made in Thacker Coal & Coke Company vs. Burke, (W. Va.) 5 L. R. A. 1091 and West Virginia Transportation Company vs. Standard Oil Company, 50 W. Va. 611, cited in argument (p. 247) by counsel for petitioner, and it will be found that in the former case, (an action at law) there was a contract for definite service, that the defendants actually caused the servants to quit their service, leave plaintiff's employment and actually refused to work longer, whereby damage actually accrued to the plaintiff; and in the latter case (also an action at law), the court construed the declaration as charging a boycott whereby the defendants caused the plaintiff to lose its customers. Attention is directed to these two cases relied on by petitioner's counsel, that the wide difference in the facts thereof between them and the case at bar may be made obvious to the Court, and this is true as to the other cases relied on by petitioner.

Petitioner's counsel in their argument assume that the material facts alleged in bill of complaint against respondents have been proved.

Upon the assumption that the facts averred in the bill against the respondents have been proved, the conclusions and deductions made by petitioner's counsel in argument necessarily follow, and upon such an assumption, the authorities cited by them apply to such a case as the one set forth in petitioner's bill of complaint. Concisely stated, what are the facts averred, assumed to have been proved, but in truth not proved?

They are these:

> (1) That respondents are seeking by inducements, threats, and intimidation to cause petitioner's employees to leave its service, and others who have engaged to enter its service, not to do so.
>
>
> (2) That respondents have maliciously formed themselves into a conspiracy to compel by threats and intimidation and by other unlawful means, petitioner's employees to join the union.
>
> (Record, p. 16.)
>
> (3) That respondents have formed a conspiracy to cause petitioner's mine to be shut down, its plant to remain idle, its contracts to be broken and unfulfilled until such time as the petitioner shall submit to the demands of the Union.

(Record, pp. 16, 17.)

(4) That some one or more of respondents, by inducement, persuasion, threats, and intimidation and by various means and devices did unlawfully make effort to induce petitioner's employees to cease working for it, and by like means, devices, intimidation, threats, persuasion, and inducement made effort to prevent men willing to work for the petitioner not to engage to work for it.

(Record, pp. 21, 22.)

(5) That respondents are now endeavoring to unionize petitioner's mine and threaten and allege to close down its mine and keep it closed until petitioner will agree to employ none but union labor.

(Record, p. 24.)

(6) That respondents, acting individually, and in conspiracy under the name of The United Mine Workers of America, will, by enticement, persuasion, or coercion in one form or the other, bring about

(a) The shutting down of petitioner's mine and the ultimate destruction of its business.

(b) Will, without the consent of the petitioner, compel it to recognize said respondents and associations in the further transaction of its business in mining and shipping coal.

(c) Will compel petitioner, to contract with its employees through respondents as officers of said association.

(d) Will compel petitioner to agree with each of its future employees as members of the United Mine Workers of America that they shall owe and yield to said Union an allegiance paramount to that which they would owe to petitioner.

(e) That respondents will take charge of, dictate the management of, and virtually control the petitioner's business, and thereby perpetuate acts of oppression and wrong upon petitioner.

(Record, pp. 26, 27.)

(7) That respondents in effecting their object of unionizing the petitioner's mine propose and threaten to use threats, intimidation, force, violence or abusive language, picketing petitioner's premises, picketing or patroling and guarding the streets and approaches to petitioner's premises and going to the homes or boarding houses of petitioner's employees for the purpose of intimidating or coercing them to leave petitioner's employment and to picket railroad and street cars passing to and from or to petitioner's premises for the purpose of intercepting petitioner's employees, and to intercept and prevent persons coming to petitioner's premises for the purpose of seeking or entering into its employ.

(Record, p. 27.)

Not one of the above seven specific charges nor a single one of the five subordinate dependent charges (a) (e) made in the bill against respondents is sustained by the proof, although each and every one thereof is denied by the answers. It is vain to base an argument upon non-existent things.

Many extracts from reports to conventions of the United Mine Workers and discussions which took place therein appear in the bill, presumably to be treated as evidentiary matters, (record, pp. 17-20) and importance seems to be attached to these parts of the bill by counsel for petitioner.

The parts of the bill containing these extracts are fully answered, (record, pp. 59-61), denied wherein they are not true, explained where necessary, and if true, admitted.

Counsel for petitioner in their argument, and the learned District Court, in its opinion, assume that the irrelevant and immaterial evidence introduced by petitioner under exceptions is properly in the record, and present and discuss these new issues founded thereon.

The petitioner by the argument of its counsel seeks to bring into this controversy two new issues—not founded upon the pleadings but upon the irrelevant evidence which it brought into the cause under exceptions duly taken thereto by the respondents.

The first of these two new and foreign issues is that the United Mine Workers of America by their representatives in joint convention at the city of Chicago in 1898 with the coal operators of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Western Pennsylvania, known as the Central Competitive Field, formed a combination and conspiracy with these operators, to unionize all the coal mines in West Virginia against the consent of the owners thereof, and thus ruin the coal industry in the State of West Virginia, and it is further argued that the acts imputed to respondents in the petitioner's bill were done in furtherance of such a conspiracy, while the bill itself does not allege any such conspiracy. In support of this new and foreign issue, counsel for petitioner relies largely upon the documentary evidence and especially upon "McKinley Exhibit No. 4", as well also as the learned District Court in its opinion.

(Argument, No. 2, pp. 7–33.)

There is not even an allusion in petitioner's bill to such a conspiracy as thus assumed in argument and by the learned district judge in his opinion.

The conspiracy charged in the bill is one formed by the respondents after petitioner began to operate its mine non-union (June 12, 1906), to unionize petitioner's mine against its consent and expressed desire.

It is further argued upon this irrelevant testimony, that as the United Mine Workers of America formed a conspiracy in 1898 with the operators of the "Central Competitive Field" to unionize all the coal mines of West Virginia, that, therefore, this labor union is unlawful, and should be so declared, and that the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit erred in holding otherwise, and thus another new and foreign issue is brought into the cause, inasmuch as the lawfulness of this organization is challenged in the bill, because of certain specific provisions in the constitutions of its national and subordinate associations, (record, pp. 6-15, 25) averred to be in contravention of the constitution and laws of West Virginia.

No material issue can be considered by the Court except that raised by the pleadings. This is an elementary rule of procedure.

As we have already shown in our Original Brief (p. 53), ~~that~~ the evidence must relate to the allegations made in the bill, and in addition to the authorities there cited, attention is called to some of the many other cases supporting this rule of equity practice.

Reynold vs. Stockton, 140 U. S. 254, 35 Law. Ed. 464, 468.

Carneal vs. Banks, 10 Wheat. 181, 6 Law. Ed. 294.

Cracket vs. Lee, 7 Wheat. 522, 5 Law. Ed. 513.

Harrison vs. Nixon, 9 Pet. (U. S.) 483, 9 Law. Ed. 201, 208.

Phelps vs. Elliott, 35 Fed. 455, 461.

Wren vs. Moncure, (Va.) 28 S. E. 588, 590.

In Carneal vs. Banks, supra, the following is the second point of the syllabus as reported in 6 Law. Ed. 297:

> "A decree must be sustained by the allegations of the parties, as well as by the proofs in the cause, and cannot be founded upon a fact not put in issue by the pleadings."

In Reynolds vs. Stockton, supra, we find in the opinion as reported in 35 Law. Ed. 468, the following:

"Whatever may be the rule where substantial amendments to the complaint are permitted and made, and the defendant responds thereto, or where it appears that he takes actual part in the litigation of the matters determined, the rule is universal that where he appears and responds only to the complaint as filed, and no amendment is made thereto, the judgment is conclusive only so far as it determines matters which by the pleadings are put in issue. And this rule, which determines the conclusiveness of a judgment rendered in one court of a State, as to all subsequent inquiries in the courts of the same State, enters into and limits the constitutional provision quoted, as to the full faith and credit which must be given in one State to judgments rendered in the courts of another State."

In Phelps vs. Elliott, supra, the statement of the rule is made in the opinion:

"Although the facts proved establish the complainant's equitable title to the bonds at the time when they were purchased by Riggs & Company, it is doubtful whether under this bill of complaint he can avail himself of these facts. The bill proceeds upon the theory that his title inures by the adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States that the title to the award was vested in him. As has been stated, the court did not make any such adjudication, and it follows, now that the averment of the bill is shown to be untrue, that the case must be treated as though that averment was not in the bill. There is no other averment of title, and no facts are set forth from which an equitable title can be deduced. The rule is fundamental in equity pleading that every fact essential to the complainant's title to maintain the bill and obtain the relief must be stated in the bill, otherwise the defect will be fatal. In the language of the court, in Harrison vs. Nixon, 9 Pet. 483, 503, 'every bill must contain in itself sufficient matter of fact, per se, to maintain the case of the plaintiff. The proofs must be according to the allegations of the parties; and if the proofs go to matters not > within the allegations, the court cannot judicially act upon them as a ground for decision, for the pleadings do not put them in contestation.' The allegatta and the probata must reciprocally meet and conform to each other. A party can no more succeed upon a case proved but not alleged than upon a case alleged but not proved. Foster vs. Goddard, 1 Black, 518; Boone vs. Chiles, 10 Pet. 177. A decree must be sustained by the allegations of the parties as well as the proofs in the cause, and cannot be founded on a fact not put in issue in the pleadings. Carneal vs. Banks, 10 Wheat. 181." (35 Fed. 461.)

So in Wren vs. Moncure, supra, the court in its opinion, said:

> "In a court of equity, as well as in a court of law, the allegations and proofs must agree. A recovery will not be allowed upon a case, although proved, which differs essentially from that alleged in the bill. Smith vs. Nicholas, 8 Leigh, 354; Brown vs. Toell's Adm'rs, 5 Rand. 543; Thompson vs. Jackson, 3 Rand. 504; Hunter's Adm'rs vs. Jett, 4 Rand. 104; and Manufacturing Company vs. Evans, 84 Va. 717, 6 S. E. 2. If this were not so, as has been aptly said, the pleadings instead of being a shield to protect parties from surprise, would be a snare to entrap them."
> In Crocket vs. Lee, 7 Wheat. 522, it was said by Chief Justice Marshall: 'If the pleadings in the cause were to give no notice to the parties or to the court of the material facts on which the right asserted was to depend; no notice of the points to which the testimony was to be directed, and to which it was to be limited; if a new case might be made out in proof different from that stated in the pleadings,—all will perceive the confusion and uncertainty which would attend legal proceedings, and the injustice which must frequently take place. The rule that the decree must conform to the allegations, as well as to the proofs, of the parties, is not only one which justice requires, but one which necessity imposes on courts."

> In Jackson's Assignees vs. Cutright, 5 Munf. 314, the language of Judge Carr is not less emphatic: 'The plaintiff must prove the case which he sets out in his bill; and although he should make out in evidence a good case, which, under other circumstances, would secure the interposition of the court, yet, if it be not the very case made by the bill, it will not support the bill.'" (28 S. E. 590.)

The issues in this case are defined in this supplemental brief (p. 21) and all the essential and material matters charged against the respondents are also set forth (pp. 92-94), and the petitioner is restricted to these issues and allegations in the matter of proof, and having failed to sustain these issues, the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals will not be disturbed by this Court. But, strange to say, an extended argument is offered in support of this foreign issue, this new and fanciful conspiracy.

It would seem as if the petitioner has taken refuge under this new and foreign phase of the case, as a plausible excuse for the further prosecution of this suit. We can perceive no other reason for such a position, thus taken by petitioner's counsel.

We now respectfully submit that the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals should be affirmed.

CHAS. E. HOGG,
Counsel for Respondents.

HITCHMAN COAL & COKE COMPANY v. MITCHELL, INDIVIDUALLY, ET AL.

CERTIORARI TO THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT.

No. 11. Argued March 2, 3, 1916; restored to docket for reargument March 13, 1916; reargued December 15, 18, 1916.—Decided December 10, 1917.

The District Court has no power to decree an injunction against parties who were not served with process and who appeared only to object to the jurisdiction over them.

In order that the declarations and conduct of third parties may be admissible against persons sued with respect to acts done to carry out an alleged conspiracy, a combination between them and the defendants must be shown by independent evidence; but the criminal or otherwise unlawful character of the combination may be shown by the declarations themselves.

The same liberty which enables men to form unions, and through the unions to enter into agreements with employers willing to agree, entitles other men to remain independent of the union and other employers to agree with them to employ no man who owes any allegiance or obligation to the union. In the latter case as in the former the parties are entitled to be protected by the law in the enjoyment of the benefits of any lawful agreement they may make.

The right of action for persuading an employee to leave his employer, universally recognized, rests upon fundamental principles of general application.

The right of workingmen to form unions and to enlarge their membership by inviting other workingmen to join is conceded, provided the objects of the union be proper and legitimate.

The right of workingmen to enlarge the membership of unions by inviting other workingmen to join, like other civil rights, must be exercised with reasonable regard for the conflicting rights of others; and the members of a union having notice that the employees of an establishment are under contract with their employer not to remain in his employ after joining the union, may not lawfully, for the purpose of unionizing the establishment through an actual or threatened strike, induce or seek to induce such employees to violate their contract by joining the union, or (what in equity is the same) by secretly agreeing to join, and thereafter remaining at work until sufficient new members can be obtained so as to bring about a strike, thus uniting with the union in a plan to subvert the system of employment to which they voluntarily have agreed and upon which their employer and their fellow-employees are relying.

An employer is entitled to the good-will of his employees, irrespective of the fact that they are employed at will and that the relation is terminable by either party at any time; he is entitled to the benefit of the reasonable probability that by properly treating them he will be able to retain them in his employ and to fill vacancies occurring from time to time by the employment of other men on the same terms. It is unlawful for a third party, having notice of this relation, to interfere with it without just cause or excuse.

Intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage and which does in fact damage another person in his property or trade, is malicious in law and actionable if done without just cause or excuse.

A proffered excuse can not be deemed a just cause or excuse where it is based upon an assertion of conflicting rights that are sought to be attained by unfair methods and for the very purpose of interfering with plaintiff's rights of which defendants have notice.

Any violation of plaintiff's legal rights, contrived by defendants for the purpose of inflicting damage, or having that as its necessary effect—for example, a combination to procure concerted breaches of contract by plaintiff's employees—is as plainly unlawful as if it involved a breach of the peace.

The purpose entertained by defendants to bring about a strike at plaintiff's mine in order to compel plaintiff, through fear of financial loss, to consent to the unionization of the mine as the lesser evil, was an unlawful purpose; and the methods resorted to by defendants—the inducing of employees to unite with the union in an effort to subvert the system of employment at the mine by concerted breaches of the contracts of employment known to be in force there—were unlawful and malicious methods, not to be justified as a fair exercise of the right to increase the membership of the union.

Convinced by costly strikes of the futility of attempting to operate under a closed-shop agreement with a certain union, plaintiff established its mine on a non-union basis, with the unanimous approval of its employees and under a mutual agreement, assented to by them all, that plaintiff would continue to run its mine non-union and not recognize the union; that if any man wanted to become a member of the union he was at liberty to do so, but he could not be a member and remain in plaintiff's employ. Under that agreement plaintiff ran its mine for a year and more, and, so far as appears, without the slightest disagreement between it and its men, and without any grievance on their part. Thereupon, defendants, having full notice of the agreement, and acting without any agency for the men, but as representatives of an organization of mine workers in other States, and in order to subject plaintiff to such participation by the union in the management of the mine as necessarily results from the making of a closed-shop agreement, sent their agent to the mine, who, with full notice of, and for the very purpose of subverting, the status arising from plaintiff's agreement and subjecting the mine to the union control, proceeded, without physical violence, indeed, but by persuasion accompanied with threats of a reduction of wages and deceptive statements as to the attitude of the mine management, to induce plaintiff's employees to join the union and at the same time to break their agreement with plaintiff by remaining in its employ after joining; and this for the purpose not of enlarging the membership of the union, but of coercing plaintiff, through a strike or the threat of one, into recognition of the union. Held, that plaintiff was clearly entitled to an injunction.

MR. JUSTICE PITNEY delivered the opinion of the court.

This was a suit in equity, commenced October 24, 1907, in the United States Circuit (afterwards District) Court for the Northern District of West Virginia, by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of West Virginia, against certain citizens of the State of Ohio, sued individually and also as officers of the United Mine Workers of America. Other non-citizens of plaintiff's State were named as defendants but not served with process. Those who were served and who answered the bill were T. L. Lewis, Vice President of the U. M. W. A. and of the International Union U. M. W. A.; William Green, D. H. Sullivan, and "George" W. Savage, (his correct Christian name is Gwilym), respectively President, Vice President, and Secretary-Treasurer of District No. 6, U. M. W. A.; and A. R. Watkins, John Zelenka, and Lee Rankin, respectively President, Vice President and Secretary-Treasurer of Sub-district No. 5 of District No. 6.

Plaintiff owns about 5,000 acres of coal lands situate at or near Benwood, in Marshall County, West Virginia, and within what is known as the "Pan Handle District" of that State, and operates a coal mine thereon, employing between 200 and 300 men, and having an annual output, in and before 1907, of about 300,000 tons. At the time of the filing of the bill, and for a considerable time before and ever since, it operated its mine "non-union," under an agreement with its men to the effect that the mine should be run on a non-union basis, that the employees should not become connected with the Union while employed by plaintiff, and that if they joined it their employment with plaintiff should cease. The bill set forth these facts, inter alia, alleged that they were known to defendants and each of them, and "that the said defendants have unlawfully and maliciously agreed together, confederated, combined and formed themselves into a conspiracy, the purpose of which they are proceeding to carry out and are now about to finally accomplish, namely: to cause your orator's mine to be shut down, its plant to remain idle, its contracts to be broken and unfulfilled, until such time as your orator shall submit to the demand of the Union that it shall unionize its plant, and having submitted to such demand unionize its plant by employing only union men who shall become subject to the orders of the Union," etc. The general object of the bill was to obtain an injunction to restrain defendants from interfering with the relations existing between plaintiff and its employees in order to compel plaintiff to "unionize" the mine.

A restraining order having been granted, followed by a temporary injunction, the served defendants filed answers, and thereupon made a motion to modify the injunction, which was refused. 172 Fed. Rep. 963. An appeal taken by defendants from this order was dismissed by the Circuit Court of Appeals. 176 Fed. Rep. 549. Afterwards they applied for and obtained leave to withdraw their answers and file others; the order, however, prescribed that the withdrawn answers were "not to be removed from the file." The new answers denied all material averments of the bill, some of which had been admitted in the former answers. Plaintiff, having filed replications, obtained an order that the former answers should be treated as evidence on behalf of the plaintiff upon the issue joined. Upon this evidence and other evidence introduced before the court orally, the case was submitted, with the result that a final decree was made January 18, 1913, granting a perpetual injunction. 202 Fed. Rep. 512. This was reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals June 1, 1914 (214 Fed. Rep. 685), but the mandate was stayed pending an application to this court for a writ of certiorari. Afterwards an appeal was allowed. This court dismissed the appeal, but granted the writ of certiorari (241 U. S. 644), the record on appeal to stand as a return.

The final decree of the District Court included an award of injunction against John Mitchell, W. B. Wilson, and Thomas Hughes, who while named as defendants in the bill were not served with process and entered no appearance except to object to the jurisdiction of the court over them. Under the federal practice, the appearance to object did not bind these parties to submit to the jurisdiction on the overruling of the objection (Harkness v. Hyde, 98 U. S. 476, 479; Southern Pacific Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 206; Mexican Central Ry. Co. v. Pinkney, 149 U. S. 194, 209; Goldey v. Morning News, 156 U. S. 518; Davis v. C., C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 217 U. S. 157, 174), and since the injunction operates only in personam, it was erroneous to include them as defendants. It also was erroneous to include personal relief by injunction against certain named parties who, pending suit, were chosen to succeed some of the original defendants as officers of the international, district, and sub-district unions, but who were not served with process and did not appear, they being included upon the ground that they were "before the court by representation through service having been had upon their said predecessors in office." This suit was commenced, and was carried to final decree in the trial court, before the taking effect of the present Equity Rules (226 U. S. 629), and hence is governed by the former Rule 48 (210 U. S. 524), under which the rights of absent parties were expressly reserved.

But these procedural difficulties do not affect that part of the decree which awarded an injunction against the answering defendants (Lewis, Green, Sullivan, Savage, Watkins, Zelenka, and Rankin) "individually" and not as officers of the Union or its branches except as to Savage, against whom the decree goes in both his individual and official capacities, he alone having retained at the time of the final decree the same office he held at the beginning of the suit. If there was error in excluding the "official" responsibility of the others, it was not one of which they could complain, and it was not assigned for error upon their appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals. If they were subject to injunction at all, they were so in their individual capacities. Whether the decree will bind their successors in office, or their fellow-members of the Union, is a question to be determined hereafter, if and when proceedings are taken to enforce the injunction against parties other than the answering defendants.

We proceed, therefore, to consider the case as it stands against the answering defendants.

The District Court based its decision upon two grounds: (1) That the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America, and its branches, as conducted and managed at the time of the suit and for many years before, was a common-law conspiracy in unreasonable restraint of trade, and also and especially a conspiracy against the rights of non-union miners in West Virginia; and (2) That the defendants, in an effort to compel the plaintiff to enter into contractual relations with the Union relating to the employment of labor and the production of coal, although having knowledge of express contracts existing between plaintiff and its employees which excluded relations with the Union, endeavored by unlawful means to procure a breach of these contracts by the employees.

A brief recital of previous transactions between the parties becomes material. The Union is a voluntary and unincorporated association which was organized in the year 1890 in the States of Ohio and Indiana, and afterwards was extended to other States. It is made up of national or "international," district, sub-district, and local unions. District No. 6 comprises the coal districts of Ohio and the Panhandle of West Virginia. Sub-district No. 5 of that district comprises five counties and parts of counties in Ohio, and the Panhandle.

The answering defendants were and are active and influential members—leaders—of the Union, as well as officers. Savage, Lewis, and Sullivan have been members from its formation in 1890, and have held important offices in it and attended the national conventions. The others are long-time members, and possessed an influence indicated by the offices they held, but not limited to the duties of those offices.

From 1897 to 1906 what were known as joint interstate conferences were held annually or biennially between officials of the Union and representatives of the operators in the "Central Competitive Field" (which includes Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, but not West Virginia), for the purpose of agreeing upon the scale of wages and the conditions of employment in that field. In addition there were occasional conferences of the same character affecting other States and districts.

Plaintiff's mine is within the territorial limits of Subdistrict No. 5 of District No. 6. Coal-mining operations were commenced there in the early part of the year 1902, and the mine was operated "non-union" until April, 1903, when, under threats from the Union officials, including defendants Watkins and Sullivan, that a certain unionized mine in Ohio, owned by the same proprietors, would be closed down if the men at the Hitchman were not allowed to organize, plaintiff consented to the unionization of the latter mine. This went into effect on the 1st of April, 1903, and upon the very next day the men were called out on strike because of a disagreement with the company as to the basis upon which mining should be paid for. The strike continued until May 23, requiring plaintiff to cease operations and preventing it from fulfilling its contracts, the most important of which was one for the daily supply of engine coal to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad at a coaling station adjoining the mine. The financial loss to plaintiff was serious. The strike was settled and the men resumed work upon the basis of a modification of the official mining scale applicable to the Hitchman mine.

Again, in the spring of 1904, there was difficulty in renewing the scale. A temporary scale, agreed upon between operators and miners for the month of April, 1904, was signed in behalf of the Hitchman Company on the 18th of April. Two days later the men at the Hitchman struck, and the mine remained idle for two months, during which time plaintiff sustained serious losses in business and was put to heavy expense in obtaining coal from other sources to fill its contract with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. The strike was settled by the adoption of the official scale for the Panhandle District, with amendatory local rules for the Hitchman mine.

After this there was little further trouble until April 1,

1906, when a disagreement arose between the Union and an association of operators with which plaintiff was not connected—the association being in fact made up of its competitors—about arranging the terms of the scale for the ensuing two years. At the same time a similar disagreement arose between the operators and the Union officials in the Central Competitive Field. The result was a termination of the interstate conferences and a failure to establish any official scale for the ensuing two years, followed by a widespread strike, or a number of concurrent strikes, involving the most of the bituminous coal-producing districts. There was absolutely no grievance or ground of disagreement at the Hitchman mine, beyond the fact that the mining scale expired by its own terms on March 31, and the men had not received authority from the Union officials either to renew it or to agree to a new one in its place. Plaintiff came to an understanding with the local union to the effect that if its men would continue at work the company would pay them from April 1st whatever the new scale might be, except that if the new scale should prove to be lower than that which expired on March 31, there should be no reduction in wages, while if the scale was raised the company would pay the increased amount, dating it back to April 1st. This was satisfactory to the men; but as the question of a new scale was then under discussion at a conference between the officials of the Union and the representatives of the Operators' Association, and plaintiff's employees wished to get the sanction of their officers, the manager of the Hitchman mine got into communication with those officials, including defendant Green, President of District No. 6, and endeavored to secure their assent to the temporary arrangement, but without success. Then a committee of the local union, including Daugherty, its President, took up the matter with Green and received permission to mine and load engine coal until further notice from him. Under this arrangement the men remained at work for about two weeks. On April 15th, defendant Zelenka, Vice President of the subdistrict, visited the mine, called a meeting of the miners, and addressed them in a foreign tongue, as a result of which they went on strike the next day, and the mine was shut down until the 12th of June when it resumed as a "non-union" mine, so far as relations with the U. M. W. A. were concerned.

During this strike plaintiff was subjected to heavy losses and extraordinary expenses with respect to its business, of the same kind that had befallen it during the previous strikes.

About the 1st of June a self-appointed committee of employees called upon plaintiff's president, stated in substance that they could not remain longer on strike because they were not receiving benefits from the Union, and asked upon what terms they could return to work. They were told that they could come back, but not as members of the United Mine Workers of America; that thenceforward the mine would be run non-union, and the company would deal with each man individually. They assented to this, and returned to work on a non-union basis. Mr. Pickett, the mine superintendent, had charge of employing the men, then and afterwards, and to each one who applied for employment he explained the conditions, which were that while the company paid the wages demanded by the Union and as much as anybody else, the mine was run non-union and would continue so to run; that the company would not recognize the United Mine Workers of America; that if any man wanted to become a member of that union he was at liberty to do so; but he could not be a member of it and remain in the employ of the Hitchman Company; that if he worked for the company he would have to work as a non-union man. To this each man employed gave his assent, understanding that while he worked for the company he must keep out of the Union.

Since January, 1908 (after the commencement of the suit), in addition to having this verbal understanding, each man has been required to sign an employment card expressing in substance the same terms. This has neither enlarged nor diminished plaintiff's rights, the agreement not being such as is required by law to be in writing.

Under this arrangement as to the terms of employment, plaintiff operated its mine from June 12, 1906, until the commencement of the suit in the fall of the following year.

During the same period a precisely similar method of employment obtained at the Glendale mine, a property consisting of about 1,200 acres of coal land adjoining the Hitchman property on the south, and operated by a company having the same stockholders and the same management as the Hitchman; the office of the Glendale mine being at the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company's office. Another mine in the Panhandle, known as the Richland, a few miles north of the Hitchman, likewise was run "non-union."

In fact, all coal mines in the Panhandle and elsewhere in West Virginia, except in a small district known as the Kanawha field, were run "non-union," while the entire industry in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois was operated on the "closed-shop" basis, so that no man could hold a job about the mines unless he was a member of the United Mine Workers of America. Pennsylvania occupied a middle ground, only a part of it being under the jurisdiction of the Union. Other States need not be particularly mentioned.

The unorganized condition of the mines in the Panhandle and some other districts was recognized as a serious interference with the purposes of the Union in the Central Competitive Field, particularly as it tended to keep the cost of production low, and, through competition with coal produced in the organized field, rendered it more difficult for the operators there to maintain prices high enough to induce them to grant certain concessions demanded by the Union. This was the subject of earnest and protracted discussion in the annual international convention of the U. M. W. A. held at Indianapolis, Indiana, in the month of January, 1907, at which all of the answering defendants were present as delegates and participated in the proceedings. The discussion was based upon statements contained in the annual reports of John Mitchell, as President of the Union (joined as a defendant in the bill but not served with process), and of defendant Lewis, as Vice President, respecting the causes and consequences of the strike of 1906, and the policy to be adopted by the Union for the future. In these reports it was made to appear that the strike had been caused immediately by the failure of the joint convention of operators and miners representing the central and southwestern competitive fields, held in the early part of the year 1906, to come to an agreement for a renewal of the mining scale; that the strike was widespread, involving not less than 400,000 mine workers, was terminated by "district settlements," with variant results in different parts of the territory involved, and had not been followed by a renewal of the former relations between the operators and miners in the Central Competitive Field. Another result of the strike was a large decrease in the membership of the Union. Two measures of relief were proposed: first, that steps be taken to reëstablish the joint interstate conferences; and second, the organization of the hitherto unorganized fields, including the Panhandle District of West Virginia, under closed-shop agreements, with all men about the mines included in the membership of the United Mine Workers of America. In the course of the discussion the purpose of organizing West Virginia in the interest of the unionized mine workers in the Central Competitive Field, and the probability that it could be organized only by means of strikes, were repeatedly declared and were disputed by nobody. All who spoke advocated strikes, differing only as to whether these should be nation-wide or sectional. Defendant Lewis, in his report, recommended an abandonment of the policy of sectional settlements which had been pursued in the previous year. This recommendation, interpreted as a criticism of the policy pursued under the leadership of President Mitchell in the settlement of the 1906 strike, was the subject of long and earnest debate, in the course of which Lewis said: "When we organize West Virginia, when we organize the unorganized sections of Pennsylvania, we will organize them by a strike movement." And again, towards the close of the debate: "No one has made the statement that we can organize West Virginia without a strike." Defendant Green took part, favoring the view of Mr. Lewis that strikes should be treated nationally instead of sectionally. In the course of his remarks he said: "I say to you, gentlemen, one reason why I opposed the policy that was pursued last year was because over in Ohio we were peculiarly situated. We had West Virginia on the south and Pennsylvania on the east, and after four months of a strike in eastern Ohio we had reached the danger line. We felt keenly the competition from West Virginia, and during the suspension our mines in Ohio chafed under the object lesson they had. They saw West Virginia coal go by, train-load after train-load passing their doors, when they were on strike. This coal supplied the markets that they should have had. There is no disguising the fact, something must be done to remedy this condition. Year after year Ohio has had to go home and strike in some portion of the district to enforce the interstate agreement that was signed up here. . . . I confess here and now that the overwhelming sentiment in Ohio was that a settlement by sections would not correct the conditions we complained of. Now, something must be done; it is absolutely necessary to protect us against the competition that comes from the unorganized fields east of us." Mr. Mitchell opposed the view of defendant Lewis, reiterating an opinion, repeatedly expressed before, that West Virginia and the other unorganized fields, "would not be thoroughly organized except as the result of a successful strike"; but declaring that "they will not be organized at all, strike or no strike, unless we are able to support the men in those fields from the first day they lay down their tools. . . . Now, I believe it is possible, indeed I believe it is probable, that in the not distant future we will be able to inaugurate a movement in West Virginia and the other unorganized fields that will involve them in a strike, and then we will expect you to furnish the sinews of war, as you have done in the past, to keep these men in idleness."

The discussion continued during three days, and at the end of it the report of a committee which expressed disagreement with Vice President Lewis' opposition to sectional settlements and recommended "a continuation in the future of the same wise, conservative business-like policies" that had been pursued by President Mitchell, was adopted by a viva voce vote.

The plain effect of this action was to approve a policy which, as applied to the concrete case, meant that in order to relieve the union miners of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois from the competition of the cheaper product of the non-union mines of West Virginia, the West Virginia mines should be "organized" by means of strikes local to West Virginia, the strike benefits to be paid by assessments upon the union miners in the other States mentioned, while they remained at work.

This convention was followed by an annual convention of Sub-district 5 of District 6, held in the month of March, 1907, at which defendants Watkins and Rankin were present as President and Secretary of the sub-district. Defendant Lewis, as National Vice President, occupied the chair during several of the sessions. Defendant Zelenka was present as a delegate, and also Thomas Hughes, who, while named as a defendant in the present suit, was not served with process. Watkins and Rankin in their reports recommended the complete unionization of the mines in the Panhandle counties, with particular reference to the Hitchman, the Glendale, the Richland, and two others; and as a result it was resolved "that the Sub-District officers, together with the District officers, be authorized to take up the work of organizing every mine in the Sub-District as quickly as it can be done."

Evidently in pursuance of this resolution, defendants Green, Zelenka, and Watkins, about July 1, 1907, called at plaintiff's office and laid before its general manager, Mr. Koch, a proposition for the unionization of the mine. He declined to consider it, but at their request laid it before plaintiff's board of directors, who rejected the proposition, and the manager informed Green of this. In one of the interviews Koch informed these defendants of the terms of plaintiff's working agreement with its employees to the effect that the mine was to be run non-union and they were not to become members of the Union.

About the same time, a Mr. McKinley, who was operating the Richland mine non-union, was interviewed by the Union leaders, notified of the resolution adopted by the sub-district convention, and, having asked that his mine be let alone, was met with the threat that they would secure the support of his men, and that if he did not recognize the Union they would shut down his mine.

In one of the interviews that ensued he was told that it was their purpose to organize the Glendale, the Hitchman, the Richland, and some other mines; that at the Glendale they had twenty-four men who had joined the organization, "and that they had sixty men who had signed up or had agreed to join the organization at Hitchman, and that they were going to shut the mine down as soon as they got a few more men." With respect to their progress at his own mine he was kept in the dark until about the middle of October, 1907, when, through the activities of the organizer Hughes, they succeeded in shutting it down, and it remained closed until a restraining order was allowed by the court, immediately after which it resumed non-union.

The evidence renders it clear that Hughes was sent into the Panhandle to organize all the mines there, in accordance with the resolution of the sub-district convention. The bill made a statement of his activities, and alleged that he was acting as an organizer for the Union. Defendants' final answers made a complete denial, but in this are contradicted by admissions made in the earlier answers and by other and undisputed evidence. The only defendant who testified upon the subject declared that Hughes was employed by District No. 6 as an organizer, but denied that he had power or authority to shut down the Hitchman mine.

He arrived at that mine some time in September, 1907, and remained there or in that vicinity until the latter part of October, conducting a campaign of organization at the Hitchman and at the neighboring Glendale and Richland mines.

The evidence shows that he had distinct and timely notice that membership in the Union was inconsistent with the terms of employment at all three mines, and a violation of the express provisions of the agreement at the Hitchman and Glendale.

Having unsuccessfully applied to Koch and McKinley for their coöperation, Hughes proceeded to interview as many of the men as he could reach and to hold public meetings in the interest of the Union. There is clear and uncontradicted evidence that he did not confine himself to mere persuasion, but resorted to deception and abuse. In his public speeches he employed abusive language respecting Mr. Pickett, William Daugherty, and Jim Jarrett.[1] He prophesied, in such a way that ignorant, foreign-born miners, such as he was addressing, naturally might believe him to be speaking with knowledge, that the wages paid by the Hitchman would be reduced unless the mine was unionized. The evidence as to the methods he employed in personally interviewing the miners, while meagre, is significant. Myers, a Hitchman miner, testified: "He told me that he was a good friend of Mr. Koch, and that Mr. Koch had nothing against having the place organized again. He said he was a friend of his, and I made the remark that I would ask Mr. Koch and see if it was so; and he said no, that was of no use because he was telling me the truth." He did not confine his attentions to men who already were in plaintiff's employ, but in addition dissuaded men who had accepted employment from going to work.

A highly significant thing, giving character to Hughes' entire course of conduct, is that while his solicitation of the men was more or less public, as necessarily it had to be, he was careful to keep secret the number and the names of those who agreed to join the Union. Myers, being asked to allow his name to be entered on a book

[1] Mr. Pickett was superintendent of the Hitchman and Glendale mines, and it was with him that the miners made their agreements to refrain from membership in the Union; Daugherty and Jarrett were miners at the Hitchman, and had been, respectively, President and Financial Secretary of the local union at the time of the 1906 strike, when the local deserted the U. M. W. A.

that Hughes carried, tried to see the names already entered, "but he would not show anything; he told me he had it, and I asked him how many names was on it, and he said he had about enough to 'crack off.'" To Stewart, another Hitchman miner, he said "he was forming a kind of secret order among the men; he said he had a few men—he did not state the number of them—and he said each man was supposed to give him so much dues to keep it going, and then he said after he got the majority he would organize the place." Pickett, the mine superintendent, had learned of only five men at the Glendale who were inclined to join Hughes' movement; but when these were asked to remain outside of the mine for a talk, fifteen other men waited with them, and upon being reminded that while the company would not try to prevent them from becoming mem- of the Union, they could not be members and at the same time work for the Glendale Company, they all accepted this as equivalent to a notice of discharge. And, as has been stated, the owner of the Richland, while repeatedly threatened with unionization, was kept in the dark as to the progress made by the organizer amongst his employees until the mine was actually shut down.

The question whether Hughes had "power or authority" to shut down the Hitchman mine is beside the mark. We are not here concerned with any question of ultra vires, but with an actual threat of closing down plaintiff's mine, made by Hughes while acting as agent of an organized body of men who indubitably were united in a purpose to close it unless plaintiff would conform to their wishes with respect to its management, and who lacked the power to carry out that purpose only because they had not as yet persuaded a sufficient number of the Hitchman miners to join with them, and hence employed Hughes as an "organizer" and sent him to the mine with the very object of securing the support of the necessary number of miners. They succeeded with respect to one of the mines threatened (the Richland), and preparations of like character were in progress at the Hitchman and the Glendale at the time the restraining order was made in this cause.

If there be any practical distinction between organizing the miners and organizing the mine, it has no application to this case. Unionizing the miners is but a step in the process of unionizing the mine, followed by the latter almost as a matter of course. Plaintiff is as much entitled to prevent the first step as the second, so far as its own employees are concerned, and to be protected against irreparable injury resulting from either. Besides, the evidence shows, without any dispute, that defendants contemplated no half-way measures, but were bent on organizing the mine, the "consent" of plaintiff to be procured through such a control of its employees as would render any further independent operation of the mine out of the question. This is evident from the discussions and resolutions of the international and sub-district conventions, from what was said by defendants Green, Zelenka, and Watkins to plaintiff's manager, and to the operator of the Richland, and from all that was said and done by Hughes in his effort to organize the Hitchman, Glendale, and Richland mines.

In short, at the time the bill was filed, defendants, although having full notice of the terms of employment existing between plaintiff and its miners, were engaged in an earnest effort to subvert those relations without plaintiff's consent, and to alienate a sufficient number of the men to shut down the mine, to the end that the fear of losses through stoppage of operations might coerce plaintiff into "recognizing the union" at the cost of its own independence. The methods resorted to by their "organizer" were such as have been described. The legal consequences remain for discussion.

The facts we have recited are either admitted or else proved by clear and undisputed evidence and indubitable inferences therefrom. The proceedings of the international and sub-district conventions were shown by the introduction of official verbatim reports, properly authenticated. It is objected that these proceedings, especially in so far as they include the declarations and conduct of others than the answering defendants, are not admissible because the existence of a criminal or unlawful conspiracy is not made to appear by evidence aliunde. The objection is untenable. In order that the declarations and conduct of third parties may be admissible in such a case, it is necessary to show by independent evidence that there was a combination between them and defendants, but it is not necessary to show by independent evidence that the combination was criminal or otherwise unlawful. The element of illegality may be shown by the declarations themselves. The rule of evidence is commonly applied in criminal cases, but is of general operation; indeed, it originated in the law of partnership. It depends upon the principle that when any number of persons associate themselves together in the prosecution of a common plan or enterprise, lawful or unlawful, from the very act of association there arises a kind of partnership, each member being constituted the agent of all, so that the act or declaration of one, in furtherance of the common object, is the act of all, and is admissible as primary and original evidence against them. Pleasants v. Fant, 22 Wall. 116, 119; Connecticut Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 188 U. S. 208, 218; Story Part., §§ 107, 108; 1 Greenleaf Ev., §§ 112, 113 (184 b, c); 2 Starkie Ev. (2d ed.) 25, 26; King v. Hardwick, 11 East, 578, 585, 589; Sandilands v. Marsh, 2 Barn. & Ald. 673, 679; Wood v. Braddick, 1 Taunt. 104, 105; Van Reimsdyk v. Kane (Story, J.), 1 Gall. 630, 635; 28 Fed. Cas. 1067, 1069; Aldrich v. Warren, 16 Maine, 465, 468; Pierce v. Wood, 23 N. H. 519, 531; Page v. Parker, 40 N. H. 47, 62; State v. Thibeau, 30 Vermont, 100, 105; Jenne v. Joslyn, 41 Vermont, 478, 484; Locke v. Stearns, 1 Metc. 560, 563; Lowe v. Dalrymple, 117 Pa. St. 564, 568; Main v. Aukam, 4 App. D. C. 51, 56.

Upon a kindred principle, the declarations and conduct of an agent, within the scope and in the course of his agency, are admissible as original evidence against the principal, just as his own declarations or conduct would be admissible. Barreda v. Silsbee, 21 How. 146, 164, 165; Vicksburg & Meridian Railroad v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 104; LaAbra Silver Mining Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 423, 498. And since the evidence of Hughes' agency is clear and undisputed—that as the representative of a voluntary association of which the answering defendants were active members, and in the execution of a purpose to which they all had given consent, and in which some of them were actively coöperating, he was engaged in an effort to organize the coal mines of the Panhandle District—it is equally clear that his declarations and conduct while so doing are evidential against the defendants.

What are the legal consequences of the facts that have been detailed?

That the plaintiff was acting within its lawful rights in employing its men only upon terms of continuing non-membership in the United Mine Workers of America is not open to question. Plaintiff's repeated costly experiences of strikes and other interferences while attempting to "run union" were a sufficient explanation of its resolve to run "non-union," if any were needed. But neither explanation nor justification is needed. Whatever may be the advantages of "collective bargaining," it is not bargaining at all, in any just sense, unless it is voluntary on both sides. The same liberty which enables men to form unions, and through the union to enter into agreements with employers willing to agree, entitles other men to remain independent of the union and other employers to agree with them to employ no man who owes any allegiance or obligation to the union. In the latter case, as in the former, the parties are entitled to be protected by the law in the enjoyment of the benefits of any lawful agreement they may make. This court repeatedly has held that the employer is as free to make non-membership in a union a condition of employment, as the working man is free to join the union, and that this is a part of the constitutional rights of personal liberty and private property, not to be taken away even by legislation, unless through some proper exercise of the paramount police power. Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, 174; Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, 14. In the present case, needless to say, there is no act of legislation to which defendants may resort for justification.

Plaintiff, having in the exercise of its undoubted rights established a working agreement between it and its employees, with the free assent of the latter, is entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of the resulting status, as in any other legal right. That the employment was "at will," and terminable by either party at any time, is of no consequence. In Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 38, this court ruled upon the precise question as follows: "It is said that the bill does not show an employment for a term, and that under an employment at will the complainant could be discharged at any time for any reason or for no reason, the motive of the employer being immaterial. The conclusion, however, that is sought to be drawn is too broad. The fact that the employment is at the will of the parties, respectively, does not make it one at the will of others. The employé has manifest interest in the freedom of the employer to exercise his judgment without illegal interference or compulsion, and, by the weight of authority, the unjustified interference of third persons is actionable although the employment is at will." (Citing many cases.)

In short, plaintiff was and is entitled to the good will of its employees, precisely as a merchant is entitled to the good will of his customers although they are under no obligation to continue to deal with him. The value of the relation lies in the reasonable probability that by properly treating its employees, and paying them fair wages, and avoiding reasonable grounds of complaint, it will be able to retain them in its employ, and to fill vacancies occurring from time to time by the employment of other men on the same terms. The pecuniary value of such reasonable probabilities is incalculably great, and is recognized by the law in a variety of relations. See Brennan v. United Hatters, (cited with approval in Truax v. Raich, supra,) 73 N. J. L. 729, 749; Brown v. Honiss, 74 N. J. L. 501, 514 et seq.; Jersey City Printing Co. v. Cassidy, 63 N. J. Eq. 759, 767; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Massachusetts, 555, 565–566; Moran v. Dunphy, 177 Massachusetts, 485, and cases there cited; L. D. Wilcutt & Sons Co. v. Driscoll, 200 Massachusetts, 110, 117, etc.

The right of action for persuading an employee to leave his employer is universally recognized—nowhere more clearly than in West Virginia—and it rests upon fundamental principles of general application, not upon the English statute of laborers. Thacker Coal Co. v. Burke, 59 W. Va. 253, 255; 8 Ann. Cas. 885, 886; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Massachusetts, 555, 567; Angle v. Chicago, St. Paul &c. Ry. Co., 151 U. S. 1, 13; Noice Adm'x. v. Brown, 39 N. J. L. 569, 572.

We turn to the matters set up by way of justification or excuse for defendants' interference with the situation existing at plaintiff's mine.

The case involves no question of the rights of employees.

Defendants have no agency for plaintiff's employees, nor do they assert any disagreement or grievance in their behalf. In fact, there is none; but, if there were, defendants could not, without agency, set up any rights that employees might have. The right of the latter to strike would not give to defendants the right to instigate a strike. The difference is fundamental.

It is suggested as a ground of criticism that plaintiff endeavored to secure a closed non-union mine through individual agreements with its employees, as if this furnished some sort of excuse for the employment of coercive measures to secure a closed union shop through a collective agreement with the Union. It is a sufficient answer, in law, to repeat that plaintiff had a legal and constitutional right to exclude union men from its employ. But it may be worth while to say, in addition: first, that there was no middle ground open to plaintiff; no option to have an "open shop" employing union men and non-union men indifferently; it was the Union that insisted upon closed-shop agreements, requiring even carpenters employed about a mine to be members of the Union, and making the employment of any non-union man a ground for a strike; and secondly, plaintiff was in the reasonable exercise of its rights in excluding all union men from its employ, having learned, from a previous experience, that unless this were done union organizers might gain access to its mine in the guise of laborers.

Defendants set up, by way of justification or excuse, the right of workingmen to form unions, and to enlarge their membership by inviting other workingmen to join. The right is freely conceded, provided the objects of the union be proper and legitimate, which we assume to be true, in a general sense, with respect to the Union here in question. Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U. S. 418, 439. The cardinal error of defendants' position lies in the assumption that the right is so absolute that it may be exercised under any circumstances and without any qualification; whereas in truth, like other rights that exist in civilized society, it must always be exercised with reasonable regard for the conflicting rights of others. Brennan v. United Hatters, 73 N. J. L. 729, 749. The familiar maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas—literally translated, "So use your own property as not to injure that of another person," but by more proper interpretation, "so as not to injure the rights of another," (Broom's Leg. Max., 8th ed., 289)—applies to conflicting rights of every description. For example, where two or more persons are entitled to use the same road or passage, each one in using it is under a duty to exercise care not to interfere with its use by the others, or to damage them while they are using it. And a most familiar application is the action for enticing an employee, in which it never was a justification that defendant wished to retain for himself the services of the employee. 1 Black. Com. 429; 3 Id. 142.

Now, assuming defendants were exercising, through Hughes, the right to invite men to join their Union, still they had plain notice that plaintiff's mine was run "non-union," that none of the men had a right to remain at work there after joining the Union, and that the observance of this agreement was of great importance and value both to plaintiff and to its men who had voluntarily made the agreement and desired to continue working under it. Yet defendants, far from exercising any care to refrain from unnecessarily injuring plaintiff, deliberately and advisedly selected that method of enlarging their membership which would inflict the greatest injury upon plaintiff and its loyal employees. Every Hitchman miner who joined Hughes' "secret order" and permitted his name to be entered upon Hughes' list was guilty of a breach of his contract of employment and acted a lie whenever thereafter he entered plaintiff's mine to work. Hughes not only connived at this, but must be deemed to have caused and procured it, for it was the main feature of defendants' plan, the sine qua non of their programme. Evidently it was deemed to be necessary, in order to "organize the Panhandle by a strike movement," that at the Hitchman, for example, man after man should be persuaded to join the Union, and having done so to remain at work, keeping the employer in ignorance of their number and identity, until so many had joined that by stopping work in a body they could coerce the employer and the remaining miners to "organize the mine," that is, to make an agreement that none but members of the Union should be employed, that terms of employment should be determined by negotiation not with the employees but with union officers—perhaps residents of other States and employees of competing mines—and that all questions in controversy between the mine operator and the miners should likewise be settled with outsiders.

True, it is suggested that under the existing contract an employee was not called upon to leave plaintiff's employ until he actually joined the Union, and that the evidence shows only an attempt by Hughes to induce the men to agree to join, but no attempt to induce them to violate their contract by failing to withdraw from plaintiff's employment after actually joining. But in a court of equity, which looks to the substance and essence of things and disregards matters of form and technical nicety, it is sufficient to say that to induce men to agree to join is but a mode of inducing them to join, and that when defendants "had sixty men who had signed up or agreed to join the organization at Hitchman," and were "going to shut the mine down as soon as they got a few more men," the sixty were for practical purposes, and therefore in the sight of equity, already members of the Union, and it needed no formal ritual or taking of an oath to constitute them such; their uniting with the Union in the plan to subvert the system of employment at the Hitchman mine, to which they had voluntarily agreed and upon which their employer and their fellow employees were relying, was sufficient.

But the facts render it plain that what the defendants were endeavoring to do at the Hitchman mine and neighboring mines cannot be treated as a bona fide effort to enlarge the membership of the Union. There is no evidence to show, nor can it be inferred, that defendants intended or desired to have the men at these mines join the Union, unless they could organize the mines. Without this, the new members would be added to the number of men competing for jobs in the organized districts, while non-union men would take their places in the Panhandle mines. Except as a means to the end of compelling the owners of these mines to change their method of operation, the defendants were not seeking to enlarge the union membership.

In any aspect of the matter, it cannot be said that defendants were pursuing their object by lawful means. The question of their intentions—of their bona fides—cannot be ignored. It enters into the question of malice. As Bowen, L. J., justly said, in the Mogul Steamship Case, 23 Q. B. Div. 613, "Intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does, in fact, damage another in that other person's property or trade, is actionable if done without just cause or excuse." And the intentional infliction of such damage upon another, without justification or excuse, is malicious in law. Bitterman v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 207 U. S. 205, 223; Brennan v. United Hatters, 73 N. J. L. 729, 744 et seq., and cases cited. Of course, in a court of equity, when passing upon the right of injunction, damage threatened, irremediable by action at law, is equivalent to damage done. And we cannot deem the proffered excuse to be a "just cause or excuse," where it is based, as in this case, upon an assertion of conflicting rights that are sought to be attained by unfair methods, and for the very purpose of interfering with plaintiff's rights, of which defendants have full notice.

Another fundamental error in defendants' position consists in the assumption that all measures that may be resorted to are lawful if they are "peaceable"—that is, if they stop short of physical violence, or coercion through fear of it. In our opinion, any violation of plaintiff's legal rights contrived by defendants for the purpose of inflicting damage, or having that as its necessary effect, is as plainly inhibited by the law as if it involved a breach of the peace. A combination to procure concerted breaches of contract by plaintiff's employees constitutes such a violation. Flaccus v. Smith, 199 Pa. St. 128; 54 L. R. A. 640; South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co., [1905] A. C. 239, 244, 250, 253; Jonas Glass Co. v. Glass Bottle Blowers Association, 77 N. J. Eq. 219, 223.

The present is not a case of merely withholding from an employer an economic need—as a supply of labor—until he assents to be governed by union regulations. Defendants have no supply of labor of which plaintiff stands in need. By the statement of defendant Lewis himself, made in his formal report to the Indianapolis convention of 1907, out of more than 370,000 coal miners in the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia, less than 80,000 (about 22 per cent.) were members of the Union. Considering the Panhandle separately, doubtless the proportion was even smaller, and the supply of non-union labor ample. There is no reason to doubt that if defendants had been actuated by a genuine desire to increase the membership of the Union without unnecessary injury to the known rights of plaintiff, they would have permitted their proselytes to withdraw from plaintiff's employ when and as they became affiliated with the Union—as their contract of employment required them to do—and that in this event plaintiff would have been able to secure an adequate supply of non-union men to take their places. It was with knowledge of this, and because of it, that defendants, through Hughes as their agent, caused the new members to remain at work in plaintiff's mine until a sufficient number of men should be persuaded to join so as to bring about a strike and render it difficult if not practically impossible for plaintiff to continue to exercise its undoubted legal and constitutional right to run its mine "non-union."

It was one thing for plaintiff to find, from time to time, comparatively small numbers of men to take vacant places in a going mine, another and a much more difficult thing to find a complete gang of new men to start up a mine shut down by a strike, when there might be a reasonable apprehension of violence at the hands of the strikers and their sympathizers. The disordered condition of a mining town in time of strike is matter of common knowledge. It was this kind of intimidation, as well as that resulting from the large organized membership of the Union, that defendants sought to exert upon plaintiff, and it renders pertinent what was said by this court in the Gompers Case (221 U. S. 418, 439), immediately following the recognition of the right to form labor unions: "But the very fact that it is lawful to form these bodies, with multitudes of members, means that they have thereby acquired a vast power, in the presence of which the individual may be helpless. This power, when unlawfully used against one, cannot be met, except by his purchasing peace at the cost of submitting to terms which involve the sacrifice of rights protected by the Constitution; or by standing on such rights and appealing to the preventive powers of a court of equity. When such appeal is made it is the duty of government to protect the one against the many as well as the many against the one."

Defendants' acts cannot be justified by any analogy to competition in trade. They are not competitors of plaintiff; and if they were their conduct exceeds the bounds of fair trade. Certainly, if a competing trader should endeavor to draw custom from his rival, not by offering better or cheaper goods, employing more competent salesmen, or displaying more attractive advertisements, but by persuading the rival's clerks to desert him under circumstances rendering it difficult or embarrassing for him to fill their places, any court of equity would grant an injunction to restrain this as unfair competition.

Upon all the facts, we are constrained to hold that the purpose entertained by defendants to bring about a strike at plaintiff's mine in order to compel plaintiff, through fear of financial loss, to consent to the unionization of the mine as the lesser evil, was an unlawful purpose, and that the methods resorted to by Hughes—the inducing of employees to unite with the Union in an effort to subvert the system of employment at the mine by concerted breaches of the contracts of employment known to be in force there, not to mention misrepresentation, deceptive statements, and threats of pecuniary loss communicated by Hughes to the men—were unlawful and malicious methods, and not to be justified as a fair exercise of the right to increase the membership of the Union.

There can be no question that plaintiff was threatened with danger of an immediate strike as a result of the activities of Hughes. The effect of his arguments and representations is not to be judged from the testimony of those witnesses who rejected his overtures. Naturally, it was not easy for plaintiff to find men who would testify that they had agreed with Hughes to break their contract with plaintiff. One such did testify. But the true measure of the extent of his operations and the probability of his carrying them to success are indicated by his declaration to Myers that he had about enough names at the Hitchman to "crack off," by the statement to McKinley that twenty-four men at the Glendale mine had joined the organization, and sixty at the Hitchman, and by the fact that they actually succeeded in shutting down the Richland about the middle of October. The declaration made concerning the Glendale is corroborated by the evidence of what happened at that mine.

That the damage resulting from a strike would be irremediable at law is too plain for discussion.

Therefore, upon the undisputed facts of the case, and the indubitable inferences from them, plaintiff is entitled to relief by injunction. Having become convinced by three costly strikes, occurring within a period of as many years, of the futility of attempting to operate under a closed-shop agreement with the Union, it established the mine on a non-union basis, with the unanimous approval of its employees—in fact upon their suggestion—and under a mutual agreement, assented to by every employee, that plaintiff would continue to run its mine non-union and would not recognize the United Mine Workers of America; that if any man wanted to become a member of that Union he was at liberty to do so, but he could not be a member and remain in plaintiff's employ. Under that agreement plaintiff ran its mine for a year and more, and, so far as appears, without the slighest disagreement between it and its men, and without any grievance on their part. Thereupon defendants, having full notice of the working agreement between plaintiff and its men, and acting without any agency for those men, but as representatives of an organization of mine workers in other States, and in order to subject plaintiff to such participation by the Union in the management of the mine as necessarily results from the making of a closed-shop agreement, sent their agent to the mine, who, with full notice of, and for the very purpose of subverting, the status arising from plaintiff's working agreement and subjecting the mine to the Union control, proceeded, without physical violence, indeed, but by persuasion accompanied with threats of a reduction of wages and deceptive statements as to the attitude of the mine management, to induce plaintiff's employees to join the Union and at the same time to break their agreement with plaintiff by remaining in its employ after joining; and this for the purpose not of enlarging the membership of the Union, but of coercing plaintiff, through a strike or the threat of one, into recognition of the Union.

As against the answering defendants, plaintiff's right to an injunction is clear; as to the others named as defendants, but not served with process, the decree is erroneous, as already stated.

Respecting the sweep of the injunction, we differ somewhat from the result reached by the District Court.

So far as it restrains—(1) Interfering or attempting to interfere with plaintiff's employees for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mine without its consent, by representing or causing to be represented to any of plaintiff's employees, or to any person who might become an employee of plaintiff, that such person will suffer or is likely to suffer some loss or trouble in continuing in or in entering the employment of plaintiff, by reason of plaintiff not recognizing the Union, or because plaintiff runs a non-union mine; (2) Interfering or attempting to interfere with plaintiff's employees for the purpose of unionizing the mine without plaintiff's consent, and in aid of such purpose knowingly and wilfully bringing about the breaking by plaintiff's employees of contracts of service known at the time to exist with plaintiff's present and future employees; (3) Knowingly and wilfully enticing plaintiff's employees, present or future, to leave plaintiff's service on the ground that plaintiff does not recognize the United Mine Workers of America or runs a non-union mine, etc.; (4) Interfering or attempting to interfere with plaintiff's employees so as knowingly and wilfully to bring about the breaking by plaintiff's employees, present and future, of their contracts of service, known to the defendants to exist, and especially from knowingly and wilfully enticing such employees, present or future, to leave plaintiff's service without plaintiff's consent; (5) Trespassing on or entering upon the grounds and premises of plaintiff or its mine for the purpose of interfering therewith or hindering or obstructing its business, or with the purpose of compelling or inducing, by threats, intimidation, violent or abusive language, or persuasion, any of plaintiff's employees to refuse or fail to perform their duties as such; and (6) Compelling or inducing or attempting to compel or induce, by threats, intimidation, or abusive or violent language, any of plaintiff's employees to leave its service or fail or refuse to perform their duties as such employees, or compelling or attempting to compel by like means any person desiring to seek employment in plaintiff's mine and works from so accepting employment therein;—the decree is fully supported by the proofs. But it goes further, and awards an injunction against picketing and against acts of physical violence, and we find no evidence that either of these forms of interference was threatened. The decree should be modified by eliminating picketing and physical violence from the sweep of the injunction, but without prejudice to plaintiff's right to obtain an injunction hereafter against these forms of interference if proof shall be produced, either in proceedings supplemental to this action or in an independent action, that such an injunction is needed.

The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals is reversed, and the decree of the District Court is modified as above stated, and as so modified it is affirmed, and the cause is remanded to the District Court for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS, dissenting.

This suit was begun October 24, 1907. The Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, plaintiff below, is the owner of a coal mine in West Virginia. John Mitchell and nine others, defendants below, were then the chief executive officers of the United Mine Workers of America and of its district and sub-district organizations having "jurisdiction" over the territory in which plaintiff's mine is situated; and were sued both individually and as such officers. The mine had been "unionized" about three years prior to April 16th, 1906; and until about that date was operated as a "union" mine, under a collective agreement with a local union of the United Mine Workers of America. Then a strike was declared by the union; and a short shut-down followed. While the strike so declared was still in force, as the bill alleges, the company re-opened the mine as a closed non-union mine. Thereafter persons applying for work were required as a condition of obtaining employment to agree that they would not, while in the service of the company, be a member of the union, and if they joined the union would withdraw from the company's employ.[1]

---

[1] About two months after the restraining order was issued in this case the plaintiff company began the practice of requiring applicants for work to sign employment cards, in the following terms:

"I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America, and will not become so while an employee of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company; that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ. If at any time I am employed by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company I will not make any efforts amongst its employees to bring about the union-

Alleging that efforts were being made illegally to unionize its mine "without its consent," the company brought in the United States Circuit (now District) Court for the Northern District of West Virginia this suit to enjoin such efforts. District Judge Dayton granted a restraining order upon the filing of the bill. An order was entered May 26, 1908, continuing it as a temporary injunction. A motion to modify the same was denied, September 21, 1909. 172 Fed. Rep. 963. An appeal from this order was dismissed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, March 11, 1910. 176 Fed. Rep. 549. The case was then heard on the merits; defendants having denied in their answer all the charges of unlawful conduct set forth in the bill; and on January 18, 1913, a decree was entered for a perpetual injunction substantially in the form of the restraining order. 202 Fed. Rep. 512. This decree was reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals on June 1, 1914 (214 Fed. Rep. 685); but a stay was granted pending an application to this court for a writ of certiorari. The company appealed to this court and also applied for a writ of certiorari. The appeal was dismissed, as the jurisdiction of izing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above or heard the same read."

Prior to that time, the agreement rested in oral understanding merely, and is sufficiently indicated in the following excerpts from the testimony of the mine superintendent as to what he told the men applying for employment:

"I also told them that any man who wanted to become a member of the United Mine Workers—that that was his business—but he could not be a member of the United Mine Workers and be affiliated with the United Mine Workers and be under the employ of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company, or be under the jurisdiction of the United Mine Workers; that the mine was run non-union so far as the United Mine Workers of America were concerned.

"Q. You mean you made every man understand that while he worked for the Hitchman Company he must keep out of the union?

"A. Yes, sir; or at least they said they understood it."

the Circuit (District) Court was rested wholly upon diversity of citizenship, plaintiff being a corporation organized under the laws of West Virginia and all the defendants citizens and residents of other States. 241 U. S. 644. A writ of certiorari was granted, however, March 13, 1916. The case was argued at that term and a reargument was ordered.

The District Court held that the United Mine Workers of America with its subordinate branches constitutes an unlawful organization—illegal both under the law of West Virginia and under the Federal Anti-Trust Act; that its long continued effort to unionize the mines of West Virginia had not been "in the interest either of the betterment of mine labor in the State or of upholding that free commerce in coal between the States guaranteed by Federal law," but to restrain if not destroy it for the benefit of "rival operators and producers in Ohio, Western Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Indiana, competitive fields" in which the mines had been unionized; and that "in pursuit of its unlawful purposes" the union "have sought and still seek to compel the plaintiff . . . to submit to contractual relations with it as an organization relating to the employment of labor and production contrary to the will and wish of said company; that its officers, in pursuance of such unlawful effort to monopolize labor and restrain trade, and with knowledge of the express contracts existing between this plaintiff and its employees, have unlawfully sought to cause the breach of the said contracts on the part of its said employees."

The decree, besides the usual injunction against threat, intimidation, force or violence, and against inducing breaches of employees' contracts or trespassing upon plaintiff's property, enjoined defendants (and others hereinafter described), among other things, from—

1. "Representing ["for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent"] . . . to any of plaintiff's employees, or to any person who might become an employee of plaintiff, that such person . . . is likely to suffer some loss or trouble in continuing in or in entering the employment of plaintiff, . . . representing . . . to such employee . . . that such loss or trouble . . . may come by reason of plaintiff not recognizing the United Mine Workers of America, or because plaintiff runs a non-union mine."

2. " . . . knowingly and wilfully enticing ["for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent"] plaintiff's employees, present or future, . . . to leave plaintiff's service, giving or assigning . . . as a reason for . . . leaving of plaintiff's service, that plaintiff does not recognize the United Mine Workers of America, or that plaintiff runs a non-union mine."

3. " . . . knowingly and wilfully enticing plaintiff's employees, present or future, . . . to leave plaintiff's service, without plaintiff's consent, against plaintiff's will, and to plaintiff's injury."

4. " . . . establishing a picket . . . for the purpose of inducing . . . by . . . persuasion . . . any person . . . coming to plaintiff's mine to accept employment . . . to refuse . . . to accept service with plaintiff."

5. " . . . interfering in any manner whatsoever, either by . . . persuasion or entreaty with any person in the employ of plaintiff who has contracted with and is in the actual service of plaintiff to . . . induce him to quit the service of plaintiff . . . or assisting, or abetting in any manner" his doing so.

Three of the defendants—Mitchell, Wilson and Hughes—were never served with process and did not enter any appearance except to object to the jurisdiction of the court over them. Of the remaining seven all but two had, prior to the entry of the final decree, ceased to hold any office either in the United Mine Workers of America or in any of the district or sub-district organizations. Nevertheless the decree directed that the injunction issue against each of the ten original defendants, "individually"; and also in their official capacities against their successors in office (who were named in the decree) although these had not been served with process or been named in the bill; the court declaring such persons to be "before the court by representation through service having been made upon their said predecessors in office, sued as such officers and as members of the United Mine Workers of America." The decree extended the injunction, among others, also to "all persons now members of said United Mine Workers of America, and all persons who though not now members do become members of said United Mine Workers of America."

The Circuit Court of Appeals, reversing the decree of the District Court, held that the United Mine Workers of America was not an unlawful organization under the laws of West Virginia, that its validity under the Federal Anti-Trust Act could not be considered in this proceeding; that so long as defendants "refrained from resorting to unlawful measures to effectuate" their purpose "they could not be said to be engaged in a conspiracy to unionize plaintiff's mine"; that "the evidence fails to show that any unlawful methods were resorted to by these defendants in this instance"; and specifically that there was nothing in the individual contracts which barred defendants from inducing the employees to join the union. With these conclusions I agree substantially.

First: The alleged illegality of the United Mine Workers of America under the law of West Virginia.

The United Mine Workers of America does not appear to differ essentially in character and purpose from other international unions which, like it, are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Its membership is said to be larger than that of any other; and it may be more powerful. But the common law does not limit the size of unions or the degree to which individual workmen may by union increase their bargaining power. As stated in Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U. S. 418, 439: "The law, therefore, recognizes the right of workingmen to unite and to invite others to join their ranks, thereby making available the strength, influence and power that come from such association." We do not find either in the decisions or the statutes of West Virginia anything inconsistent with the law as declared by this court. The union is not an unlawful organization, and is not in itself an unlawful conspiracy. We have no occasion to consider the legality of the specific provisions contained in its constitution or by-laws.

Second: The alleged illegality of the United Mine Workers of America under the Federal Anti-Trust Act.

The District Judge undertook to pass upon the legality of the United Mine Workers of America under the Federal Anti-Trust Act; but the question was not in issue in the case. It had not been raised in the bill or by answer. Evidence bearing upon the issue was properly objected to by defendants and should have been excluded.

Third: The alleged conspiracy against the West Virginia Mines.

It was doubtless the desire of the United Mine Workers to unionize every mine on the American continent and especially those in West Virginia which compete directly with the mines of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and other States already unionized. That desire and the purpose to effect it were not unlawful. They were part of a reasonable effort to improve the condition of workingmen engaged in the industry by strengthening their bargaining power through unions; and extending the field of union power. No conspiracy to shut down or otherwise injure West Virginia was proved, nor was there any averment in the bill of such conspiracy, or any issue otherwise raised by the pleadings which justified the consideration of that question by the District Court.[1]

Fourth: "Unionizing plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent."

The fundamental prohibition of the injunction is against acts done "for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mine without plaintiff's consent." Unionizing a shop does not mean inducing the employees to become members of the union.[2] It means inducing the employer

[1] This alleged conspiracy not being in issue, the District Court improperly allowed the introduction of, and considered, a mass of documents referring to various mine workers' conventions, and joint conventions of miners and operators held years previous to the filing of the bill. Judge Dayton laid great stress on reported declarations of the delegates to these conventions, although the declarations of alleged co-conspirators were obviously inadmissible, there being no foundation for the conspiracy charge.

[2] A witness for the defendants testified as follows:

"There is a difference between unionizing a mine and unionizing the employees in a mine; unionizing the employees is having the men join the organization; unionizing a mine is creating joint relations between the employers and employees; a mine cannot be unionized unless the employer enters into contractual relations with the union; it is not the policy or purpose of the United Mine Workers as an organization to coerce a man into doing a thing against his will; this distinction between unionizing a mine and unionizing the employees of a mine has existed since the organization came about, and this method of unionizing a mine existed in 1906 and 1907."

A witness for the plaintiff testified that "the term 'union,' when applied to mining, means the United Mine Workers, and a union mine is a mine that is under their jurisdiction and so recognized . . ." The contrary is "non-union or open shop." And further, "The men might be unionized at a mine and the mine owners not recognize the union. That would in effect be an open shop. When I said 'unionize the employees' I meant practically all of the employees; but a union mine, as I understand it, is one wherein the closed shop is practically enforced." In such case, the witness explained, the operator would be practically in contract relation with the organization.

It was also testified: "The difference between organizing the men at to enter into a collective agreement with the union governing the relations of the employer to the employees. Unionizing implies, therefore, at least formal consent of the employer. Both plaintiff and defendants insisted upon exercising the right to secure contracts for a closed shop. The plaintiff sought to secure the closed non-union shop through individual agreements with employees. The defendants sought to secure the closed union shop through a collective agreement with the union. Since collective bargaining is legal, the fact that the workingmen's agreement is made not by individuals directly with the employer, but by the employees with the union and by it, on their behalf, with the employer, is of no significance in this connection. The end being lawful, defendant's efforts to unionize the mine can be illegal, only if the methods or means pursued were unlawful; unless indeed there is some special significance in the expression "unionizing without plaintiff's consent."

It is urged that a union agreement curtails the liberty of the operator. Every agreement curtails the liberty of those who enter into it. The test of legality is not whether an agreement curtails liberty, but whether the parties have agreed upon some thing which the law prohibits or declares otherwise to be inconsistent with the public welfare. The operator by the union agreement the mine and organizing the mine is that when the miners are organized the work of organizing the mine is only just started. They next proceed to meet with the operator who owns the mine, or operates it, for the purpose of making contracts or agreements. Under the constitution and methods of the United Mine Workers a mine cannot be organized without the consent of the owner, and it is not the object or purpose of the United Mine Workers to do so, and never has been; it has never been attempted as far as witness knows. After a mine has been organized, the agreement between the employer and the organization is paramount. The constitution of the organization has nothing to do with the workings afterwards; that agreement does not take away from the operator the control of his men."

binds himself: (1) to employ only members of the union; (2) to negotiate with union officers instead of with employees individually the scale of wages and the hours of work; (3) to treat with the duly constituted representatives of the union to settle disputes concerning the discharge of men and other controversies arising out of the employment. These are the chief features of a "unionizing" by which the employer's liberty is curtailed. Each of them is legal. To obtain any of them or all of them men may lawfully strive and even strike. And, if the union may legally strike to obtain each of the things for which the agreement provides, why may it not strike or use equivalent economic pressure to secure an agreement to provide them?

It is also urged that defendants are seeking to "coerce" plaintiff to "unionize" its mine. But coercion, in a legal sense, is not exerted when a union merely endeavors to induce employees to join a union with the intention thereafter to order a strike unless the employer consents to unionize his shop. Such pressure is not coercion in a legal sense. The employer is free either to accept the agreement or the disadvantage. Indeed, the plaintiff's whole case is rested upon agreements secured under similar pressure of economic necessity or disadvantage. If it is coercion to threaten to strike unless plaintiff consents to a closed union shop, it is coercion also to threaten not to give one employment unless the applicant will consent to a closed non-union shop. The employer may sign the union agreement for fear that labor may not be otherwise obtainable; the workman may sign the individual agreement for fear that employment may not be otherwise obtainable. But such fear does not imply coercion in a legal sense.

In other words an employer, in order to effectuate the closing of his shop to union labor, may exact an agreement to that effect from his employees. The agreement itself being a lawful one, the employer may withhold from the men an economic need—employment—until they assent to make it. Likewise an agreement closing a shop to non-union labor being lawful, the union may withhold from an employer an economic need—labor—until he assents to make it. In a legal sense an agreement entered into, under such circumstances, is voluntarily entered into; and as the agreement is in itself legal, no reason appears why the general rule that a legal end may be pursued by legal means should not be applied. Or, putting it in other words, there is nothing in the character of the agreement which should make unlawful means used to attain it, which in other connections are recognized as lawful.

Fifth: There was no attempt to induce employees to violate their contracts.

The contract created an employment at will; and the employee was free to leave at any time. The contract did not bind the employee not to join the union; and he was free to join it at any time. The contract merely bound him to withdraw from plaintiff's employ, if he joined the union. There is evidence of an attempt to induce plaintiff's employees to agree to join the union; but none whatever of any attempt to induce them to violate their contract. Until an employee actually joined the union he was not, under the contract, called upon to leave plaintiff's employ. There consequently would be no breach of contract until the employee both joined the union and failed to withdraw from plaintiff's employ. There was no evidence that any employee was persuaded to do that or that such a course was contemplated. What perhaps was intended was to secure agreements or assurances from individual employees that they would join the union when a large number of them should have consented to do so; with the purpose, when such time arrived, to have them join the union together and strike—unless plaintiff consented to unionize the mine. Such a course would have been clearly permissible under the contract.

Sixth: Merely persuading employees to leave plaintiff's employ or others not to enter it was not unlawful.

To induce third persons to leave an employment is actionable if done maliciously and without justifiable cause although such persons are free to leave at their own will. Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 38; Thacker Coal Co. v. Burke, 59 W. Va. 253. It is equally actionable so to induce others not to enter the service. The individual contracts of plaintiff with its employees added nothing to its right in this connection, since the employment was terminable at will.

As persuasion, considered merely as a means, is clearly legal, defendants were within their rights if, and only if, their interference with the relation of plaintiff to its employees was for justifiable cause. The purpose of interfering was confessedly in order to strengthen the union, in the belief that thereby the condition of workmen engaged in mining would be improved; the bargaining power of the individual workingman was to be strengthened by collective bargaining; and collective bargaining was to be ensured by obtaining the union agreement. It should not, at this day, be doubted that to induce workingmen to leave or not to enter an employment in order to advance such a purpose is justifiable when the workmen are not bound by contract to remain in such employment.

Seventh: There was no "threat, violence or intimidation."

The decree enjoined "threats, violence or intimidation." Such action would, of course, be unlawful though employed in a justifiable cause. But there is no evidence that any of the defendants have resorted to such means. The propaganda among plaintiff's employees was conducted almost entirely by one man, the defendant Hughes, a District No. 6 organizer. His actions were orderly and peaceable, consisting of informal talks with the men, and a few quietly conducted public meetings,[1] in which he argued the benefits of organization and pointed out to the men that, although the company was then paying them according to the union scale, there would be nothing to prevent a later reduction of wages unless the men united. He also urged upon the men that if they lost their present jobs, membership in the union was requisite to obtaining employment in the union mines of the neighboring States. But there is no suggestion that he exceeded the moderate bounds of peaceful persuasion, and indeed, if plaintiff's witnesses are to be believed, men with whom Hughes had talked, his argument made no impression on them, and they expressed to him their satisfaction with existing conditions at the mine.

When this suit was filed no right of the plaintiff had been infringed and there was no reasonable ground to believe that any of its rights would be interfered with; and, in my opinion, the Circuit Court of Appeals properly reversed the decree of the District Court, and directed that the bill be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES and MR. JUSTICE CLARKE concur in this dissent.

[1] Following is a notice of one of Hughes' meetings which was torn from a telegraph pole in the street by the plaintiff's mine superintendent:

"Notice to the miners of the Hitchman mine. There will be a mass meeting Friday evening at 6.30 P. M. at Nick Heil's Base Ball Grounds, for the purpose of discussing the principals of organization. President William Green will be present. All miners are cordially invited to attend."
